be premature, for while he has been beaten, the president still holds the imagination of the people. If the Democratic party chooses a course disapproved by the president, a good many politicians now fattening at the public trough are likely to lose their jobs.

You may say, "So far, good, but why the hurry?" One obvious answer is that 140 is drawing an axe. And there is another answer, less obvious, more interesting, and closely connected with the state of the world at large.

The president talks rather freely in private, and, as might be expected, in the days before he went to his son's bedside, his talk often concerned the dark threat of war abroad. Word comes from more than one Hyde Park visitor that he constantly recalled the last war's effect on the Wilson administration. None should remember better than he how Wilson began with high hopes for honest liberalism; how war came; and how it all ended—in Warren G. Harding. Apparently he also remembers what a fearful strain the last war put on every governmental institution, all over the world, and how only the strongest survived.

Out of the last war came the dictatorship—in Germany, in Russia, in Italy, and in half a dozen minor nations. It's common knowledge that the president believed American democracy to be in peril in 1932. His remark at the time of his inauguration, "If I'm not a good president, I am likely to be the last," has been repeated again and again. Now again, if his visitors are to be trusted, he has the same feeling of imminent danger.

If war comes, he foresees even greater strains than arose from the last conflict. He knows that these strains will affect even the non-participants. And he has predicted that unless American liberalism can be revitalized, unless American liberalism can be made sound and permanent, the American system will go under along with the rest. And that is one reason why he is hastening the fight for a liberal Democratic party.

That is also one reason why he may be expected to carry on the fight after the primaries are over. If the conservative Democrats think they can take the heart out of him with a few sharp punches, they are going to have to reconsider their opinion.
