VALUABLE OUTFIT FOR FILMING NEW LOCAL MOVIE FILM

Equipment valued at more than $7,500 will be used in filming "Runnin' Wild," Medford's first all-sound moving picture, said D. W. Baird, cameraman in charge of filming the local attraction. As interest is arising rapidly since the announcement was made of the local attraction, Baird again stressed that the "stunt" arranged by the Rialto theater is all for fun. And is without charge to those participating, and definitely not including any promises or even hopes of Hollywood tryouts.

An entire baggage truck load of equipment has been brought here for the production and includes a $2,000 portable Vitaphone type recording machine which will be used in making the transcribed auditions of the many entries who will parade before the microphone the night of October 11 and 12 for recorded auditions of their talent on the stage of the Rialto theater.

This immediate play-back system is used very extensively by the major studios in testing the balance of voices and sound effects, positions of actors, volume and other details of the numerous scenes before the actual filming is begun.

A regular studio microphone is used here. A condenser type instrument with two stages of pre-amplification to make it supersensitive. Baird uses as regular studio camera which is entirely electrically operated and which will give the public watching the filming a chance to see some of the intricacies of the equipment used in producing movies.

All of the scenes of "Runnin' Wild" will be taken out-of-doors. The residential part of town, others in the railroad yards and many others will be filmed in the business district.

Baird and members of the Rialto theater staff are now busy selecting locations for the filming of the many scenes which will make up the Medford movie.
