The Capital Parade

he might have told a different, and somewhat less shocking story.

For example, the worthy senator is a great opponent of government regulation of business. He might have been interested to know that, where there were 1,000 government employees handling foreign exchange when Hitler came to power, there are now 500,000 officials of the reich directly engaged in the supervision of every kind of business activity.

He might have been interested to know also that no less than six different governmental authorities—the state labor front, the state organization for industry, a special authority supervising technical developments, a special industrial board, a chamber of commerce to which every business man must belong, and the economic district officers of the army general staff.

Indeed, there are all sorts of German facts which might have interested Senator Burke. He has often complained of the powers of the Washington bureaucracy. In Germany, there are between 700 and 3,000 ordinances of economic control published each week. He has accused the new deal of encroaching on private enterprise. The army and all the other state authorities in Germany have absolute power to direct private enterprise, and do direct it, toward preparation for war. In his attacks on the labor relations board, he has repeatedly denounced "regimentation."

And in one single transaction, involving the exchange of German toys for 10,000 pounds of wool from abroad, no fewer than 680 government forms had to be filled out by the business men. It took 18 months before the last report had been filed, in triplicate.

Altogether, the life of a German business man is not a happy one. He has been forced to buy short term

A Study in Contrasts

THE ministers of Klamath Falls don't like Willis Mahoney, which isn't surprising. Mr. Mahoney is most popular in communities where he is least known. For the young man, to be perfectly frank, doesn't wear well. He has a pleasing personality and is good to look at, but anyone who cares to do a little research, both before and after, he came to Oregon, will find his popularity has always been in inverse proportion to the distance.

IT is quite the reverse with his senatorial opponent, the honorable Rufus Holman. Those who have known Rufus the longest, are invariably his most enthusiastic supporters. Those who have not, who have only met him casually or heard him talk once or twice, seldom feel inclined to cheer and praise his name. For at first blush Rufus often appears ponderous and not particularly ingratiating.

There is a perfectly obvious reason for this. Willis Mahoney is first, last and all the time a professional politician, and nothing else. That is all he ever has been, that apparently is all he ever intends to be. If some untoward event, should destroy his political prospects in this state, as was the case in his native state, he would pick up his carpetbag and depart from Oregon, as quickly as he did from Washington, try his political fortunes in California or Idaho, or Nevada. For Mr. Mahoney, like any other political prospector, is not so much interested in what he can do for any state or community, as he is in what, the state or community, can do for him. And when he finds the latter is nothing, or next to nothing, it's quite simple, he moves on.

RUFUS HOLMAN is very different. Before he entered public life Mr. Holman was a successful business man, and still is, it is entirely true he never sought public office, as strongly as public office sought him. He is also a native son, was born in Portland, and has lived there most of his life. Regardless of what his political fortunes may be, he will continue to live in this state and serve it to the best of his ability, for he not only genuinely loves his native state, he is, and always has been, as PUBLIC spirited as the day is long, unselfishly devoted to the welfare and betterment of his state.

IN fact it is doubtful if two candidates for important office in this state ever represented such a striking study in contrasts as do the Republican and Democratic candidates for U. S. Senator this year. In practically every important particular, one is the exact opposite of the other. This even extends to purely physical characteristics, Mr. Holman being large, heavy, rather slow in movement, like a wise and friendly Newfoundland dog; Mr. Mahoney being small, compact, more ingratiating and immediate in his reactions, to continue the canine simile, rather more the toy terrier type.

Being a professional however, the Klamath candidate is far more expert as a vote-getting politician. He is not only an out-and-out opportunist, quick to sense what an audience or a voter wishes to hear, and saying it, but he has what might be termed political "it" and considerable personal charm.

Rufus Holman, in spite of his vote-getting ability and long career in public life, can't lure the birds out of the trees with his come-hither smile or ingratiating way. When aroused, and a man of strong emotions he often is, he indulges in no pussyfooting, or sidestepping, but comes right out and calls a spade a spade, letting the proverbial political chips fall where they may. As a result he has made enemies in his many years of public life, but even his worst enemy never denied the man's honesty, ability, or his almost fanatical devotion to the welfare of his native state, and the people in it.

SO one comes down to rather a clear-cut issue between these two senatorial candidates, one essentially the professional politician, shrewd, adroit, smooth, ingratiating, the perfect political adventurer and opportunist.

The other, essentially the trustworthy and capable public servant, honest, sincere, deliberate, hard working, with few of the superficial qualities that attract, but practically all of the fundamental ones, that are necessary to success in Washington, D. C., on the part of the individual, and the rendering of service, permanently satisfactory to a state.

Baseball, 100 Percent Pure

THOSE who have any lingering doubts about the honesty of modern baseball, must have had them removed by the second game of the world series.

Had both teams not been out to win regardless, there would have been a disposition on the part of the Yankees to coast along after the 7th inning, and let the Cubs even up the series.

For such an outcome would have greatly stimulated both popular interest—and gate receipts—and the morale of the National leaguers, which would have rendered the series much more interesting, from the present time on.

But true to form the Yanks opened up with their big guns in the last two innings and thus pretty effectively destroyed any element of excitement or suspense as far as the ultimate result of the series is concerned.

The world series may be getting less and less important from a national sporting angle, but there is no doubt that in contrast with the past, they are today absolutely on the square.

government notes, which have not even been discounted at the government-controlled banks since last April. He has to submit to providing so wholesale that the price of literally thousands of articles in the reich are now fictitious. He must accept the government's orders to manufacture synthetic foodstuffs and synthetic clothing, and to sell them. And he has to look forward to a very chancy economic future.

By now, the international debt of Germany is admittedly 20,000,000,000 reichsmarks. Including the short term notes and other forms of vagrant government paper, government experts believe that it is actually about twice that amount. The German reserve of gold and foreign currencies, including what was taken from Austria, amounts to no more than $150,000,000. Yet, if Germany is to keep up in the armament race, she must buy raw materials abroad.

And that is why the government experts are inclined to credit the rumors of another German devaluation.

STIMULANTS AND SEDATIVES

It is a simple physiological fact that the effect of a stimulant—temporary increase of functional activity—is inevitably followed by temporary decrease of functional activity. Can't have your cake and eat it too. Thrifty, reckless persons sometimes try to revise the law of nature, of physiology, by repeating the dose of stimulant at frequent intervals. In the foolish hope of preventing the after-depression.

Among recognized stimulants there are only two which I consider necessary or advisable for domestic medicine, and these two stimulants seem to have the least pronounced after-depression of all. They are ammonia and caffeine.

Aromatic Spirits of Ammonia should be kept in the medicine cupboard in a glass-stoppered vial holding two or more ounces. It is useful as a rapidly acting stimulant in many emergencies, the dose is one-half teaspoonful given in an ounce or two of cold water, and this dose may be repeated every ten or fifteen minutes for several times if necessary. It is thus used for faintness, shock, concussion, snake-biting, heat exhaustion, heart failure or extreme depression from any cause. Being alkaline, it is especially grateful in cases of sick headache associated with nausea and hyperacidity of the stomach. Probably that is the reason some people like you lift your hand to your forehead when you smell the spirit of ammonia will quickly remove the effects of alcohol and sober a drunken person. Of course it has no such effect.

How to administer aromatic spirits of ammonia or other medicine to a person who is only partly conscious, as in syncope or fainting, shock, heat-exhaustion or heart-failure or collapse from any cause:

Mix the dose of aromatic spirits of ammonia in a glass not more than half full of water. Hold glass in your right hand, while you lift your hands, head and shoulders just a few inches off the ground or above the horizontal by supporting head and shoulders with your left hand under the pillow. Put the glass to patient's lips. If he is conscious he will drink or swallow. If he is unconscious he will not—and it would be dangerous to try to make an unconscious person take anything by mouth, as it might cause strangulation or choking. Assist from this slight elevation of the head, to administer medicine. It is better never to raise the patient's head or to permit the patient to attempt to sit up, in case of fainting, syncope, shock and the like. Always keep the head as low or even lower than the

Man About Manhattan

By GEORGE TUCKER. NEW YORK.—The presence of so many Whitneys, Vanderbilts, Vedders and other first families among the owners of racing stables has led to the belief that the turf is the complete possession of the wealthy. Which is far from the case. The percentage of one-horse stables, operated on the traditional shoe-string, is extremely high. And many of them run their single chargers on the heat tracks, too—those referred to as "the big apples."

Legalization of racing in so many states—from seven to 27 in the past decade—has increased the demand for horseflesh. Even the major tracks must find room for cheap races, and it is toward these that the modest owners point their entries. As a general thing, the type of horse groomed by these is doomed to spend all his days in small-pursed claiming events. Although it is true that some of them have been graduated into stake running, King Saxon, Unfading and even Seabiscuit once seemed condemned to such competition, but they all became champions.

The best recent anecdote concerning a one-horse stable grew out of the triumph of Miquelon, a 40-hoel shot at the local Aqueduct track. Miquelon's listed owner is the trainer, Ike Pearlstein, but jockey room gossip names a mustel comedy star as the true boss.

On the day of the fabulous victory, Pearlstein was aware that his horse had a chance. Unfortunately, however, he lacked the funds to profit by his knowledge. He hopefully circulated among the "betters," confiding to friends that Miquelon was "hot." With few exceptions, they spurned his "inside dope," preferring to be guided by the bookmakers' figures. Forty-to-one odds are almost conclusive evidence that the horse is a stiff.

Miquelon of course triumphed easily, and Times square that night was filled with breast-beaters. The tip had been spread through the Broadway sector with not a waver. And there is nothing that saddens a horse-player so much as his failure to embrace a tip that is fulfilled by performance. Even Pearlstein, contrary to the fiction and movie versions of such things, made only a scant clean-up.

Another item about a lowly stable owner further attests it as a poor man's sport. A hanger-on at one of the more popular restaurants, who seems chronically out of money, has a horse running at the local courses. Asked how he can afford to maintain a stable, meantime pleading embarrassment in the matter of his own rent, the sportsman explained: "It costs me $100 a month to stable this horse, and by entering him I am entitled to an owner's badge of admission to all tracks. There are 26 racing days a month, hence I would have to pay $130 to get into an owner, and sometimes I even win a purse with my nag."

The little city of Landau in Germany has named streets after Otto Planetta and Franz Holzweber, who were executed in 1934 for murdering the late Austrian chancellor Engelbert Dollfuss.

Every state, Alaska, Hawaii and the District of Columbia now have divisions of maternal and child health in their public health services.

Golf is believed to have derived its name from the Dutch "kolf," a club.

Comment on the Day's News

By FRANK JENKINS. WHEN a man condemned to death is reprieved at the last moment, it is big news. Imagine, then, MILLIONS of men condemned to death and reprieved at the last moment. If you can do that, you will be able to gain some adequate idea of the tremendous significance of the agreement at Munich that at least postpones a world war.

THE postponement, quite obviously, is purchased at Czechoslovakia's expense—for it is plucky little Czechoslovakia that pays the bill. Her bones are to be picked so that the rest of the world (meaning, of course, that part of the world not already at war) may have peace—at least temporarily.

BUT ask yourself this: Is it better for the Czechs to die defending their present borders or to live with their borders altered and reduced according to the terms of the Munich agreement? That is the choice they faced.

CHAMBERLAIN expresses the belief that the Munich agreement may open the way to "appeasement" in Europe? What is "appeasement" in Europe? This is the answer: It is giving to Hitler and Mussolini what they WANT in the hope that when they get what they want they will settle down and be decent.

WELL, maybe they will. The great nations of the earth (including our own) certainly hope they will—especially since SOMEBODY ELSE (meaning the little nations) has and will have to give up what Hitler and Mussolini want.

Here is the weak spot in that hope—since the world began, what dictators have wanted is ALL THEY CAN GET by fair means or foul.

THIS fact stands out: Chamberlain of England is the man of the hour. It was Chamberlain who snatched peace out of what seemed the hopeless certainty of war. He did it by bringing something new into the world—man-to-man diplomacy.

TO TIGHTEN UP ON FOREIGN AGENTS. HYDE PARK, N. Y., Oct. 7.—President Roosevelt today disclosed the administration was planning to tighten its defenses against activities of foreign spies.

The president, in response to press conference questions, said he was seeking to determine what new machinery might be set up to frustrate efforts by foreign agents to obtain the military and naval secrets of this country.

He mentioned in this connection it might be possible to effect a closer coordination of the activities of the military and naval intelligence services, the Federal Bureau of Investigation and similar agencies.

Asked whether foreign agents had increased their activities in this country, Mr. Roosevelt said he believed there was no marked increase at present, although there had been during the past 10 years.
