DON'T MARRY THE MAN
By Jeanne Bowman

Chapter One
The Stubborn Boy
The Golden Girl

THERE was an amber twilight in the elevator but it could not dim the glory of Kathleen Gregory's hair. Mirrors picked up the red-gold flame, tossed it back, and Kathleen, catching the reflection, scowled rebelliously.

The doors slid open. Her russet clad figure stepped out, and after her floated the operator's whisper, "The Golden Girl, you've read about her..."

"Just a walking advertisement," thought Kathleen, grimly, and yanked at the door of the suite before her without glancing at the gold leaf letters satirically greeting her with the despised title. Below, in subdued black, was the addition, Mining Corporation, and below this, Angus Gregory, President.

Kathleen stormed through the outer offices. "It takes four layers of offices to make Dad a president," she cried in exasperation.
"Well," she snapped, as the girl at the desk in this inner sanctum continued stacking notepaper.
"Jump up! Open the door! Say, good afternoon, Miss Gregory."

The girl at the desk did not look up. "It's a vile afternoon and I wouldn't open that door for the President of the Irish Free State, let alone a Gregory."

Kathleen stopped short and stared at her father's private secretary. "Mutiny," she pronounced.
"Mutiny?" she asked.
"Practically everything," came the cryptic retort. "My time, included."

"Discharged?"
"Discharged," she replied.
"Discharged?" she asked.
"Discharged," she replied.

"Discharged?" she asked.
"Discharged," she replied.
