DICKENS FAVORED AUTHOR OF FILM CAST DIRECTORS

By Alexander Kahn (United Press Staff Correspondent) HOLLYWOOD (UPI)—The favorite author of the Hollywood casting directors is Charles Dickens who, they say, would have made a great casting director himself. Casting players for a Dickens story on the stage or screen is no job at all because the famous English writer described every character in elaborate detail.

"His detail was so vivid that the reader almost sees the character as he reads," says Edward L. Martin, who currently is directing "A Christmas Carol." "As a result we know exactly what type to look for in every role." Dickens also performed another service for the movies when he personally supervised the illustrations used in his stories.

"Reginald Owen's makeup as Scrooge in the picture," says Martin, "was designed by Jack Dawn from a close study of the pictures and text and the use of a new kind of makeup that gives Owen that gaunt look required." Martin points to the makeup of Leo G. Carroll as the ghost of Jacob Marley in the story as an example of how closely Dickens cast his characters. From the boots to the bandage around the jaws, every item in the appearance of the actor came directly from the pages of the book.

PAROLE SYSTEM CALLED USEFUL BY PENAL EXPERT MADISON, Wis. (UPI)—Attacks on the system of parole in prison administration often are "unwarranted and unjustifiable," according to John J. Hannan, for 13 years president of the board supervising Wisconsin's penal and charitable institutions. Hannan, a director of the American Prison association, believes that the parole system, particularly as practiced in Wisconsin, is the "most useful, most humane, and highly social method of placing back in free society those who have served prison terms."
