The whole world leaped into the collar

RECENTLY ONE of our oil wells in far-off Saudi Arabia caught fire. We think you'd like to know how the whole world responded to that emergency in exactly the fashion old-time fire-horses used to leap under the harness at the sound of the alarm.

Another company, drilling within a few hundred miles, offered its aid, and still another in near, yet distant Iran, put its equipment at our service. Cables clicked and wires hummed as officials in the San Francisco home office sought the foremost oil well fire-fighter in the country. A Texan; he flew to California to confer with our people.

He would, he agreed, pick up two assistants in Texas the next day, take the Atlantic Clipper and catch Imperial Airways for Bahrain Islands—a "sleeping jump" by boat from the Arabian field. Equipment would probably come from Europe by plane.

At that point the Arabian crew put out the fire by themselves—quite a feat. But it all shows why oil well fires—once a wasteful commonplace—seldom happen nowadays. Waste is something against which the oil industry, the world over, has taken a common front. And waste—like oil well fires—is "out."

Plans and specifications for the work, are now underway, and the contract will be let in time for completion by September 1 next year.

The Oregon state highway commission has one more contract to let, covering the surfacing and macadam pavement on the Oregon side. This will be let soon, and extends from the present job, to the state line, and juncture with the California section.

CONTINUE ENLISTMENT OF NATIONAL GUARD FOR RESERVE STATUS

Continued enlistment in the national guard reserve was announced today for Company A, 188th infantry by Capt. Carl Y. Tengwald, commanding officer. Three vacancies also exist in the active muster of the company, the vacancies having been created by the enlistment of members in the regular army, Captain Tengwald said.

A recent authorized increase changed the normal strength of Company A from 60 to 80 men and established a reserve of at least 15 men, the captain explained. Those in the reserve are regularly enlisted in the national guard but are not subject to active service excepting in an emergency. In normal times they simply "lend their patriotic support to the national guard," as Captain Tengwald expressed it.
