

One Is Beloved

BY LOUISE PLATT HAUCK

YESTERDAY: While Sue is in one of her low moods, Bob drives her out to the house he bought in the hope of marrying her. Bob is charmed with her beauty. Bob again tells her he loves her.

Chapter 12

'Promise Me—'

MAYBE I'm not a very loving person, Bob—that way! It's because I don't really know about myself that I'm afraid—afraid to marry you. What if I'm just emotionally unawakened? What if—you're not the right man? I love Allen so dearly, you know, that it makes me think—

"Allen!" He swept the name aside superbly. "What a child you are, sweet, to compare that kind of love with marriage! And if you're emotionally unawakened, I'll take mighty good care that I'm the one to rouse you from your slumbers!" he concluded grimly. "Promise me, Sue, now—this minute! Promise you'll marry me at once. You see—you'll find that it will be all right. I'll make you happier than any woman ever was. We'll travel, we'll do every delightful thing you ever dreamed of... and we'll have this house, and the river, and your garden to come back to when we're tired of racing about. Sue, little Sue, promise!"

Almost she yielded. He was very strong and masterful and appealingly male as he stood there, holding her hands in his. His thick hair was rumpled by the rapid drive, his eyes looked demanding into her own.

She liked all the things she knew about him: his quick generosity, his boyish friendliness, his refusal, in spite of both those qualities, to allow himself to be taken advantage of. Allen had told her admiringly of Trenton's business shrewdness. It pleased her to know that he was not the usual rich man's son, careless of inherited money.

"Bob, I can't," she faltered at last. "I think I will, I open my lips to tell you something inside me holds me back. Perhaps—perhaps I don't know you well enough yet. You see, I've grown up with all the men I go about with; I know their background, their families. Maybe I feel a little strange with you at times."

He dropped her hands, walked to the window and stood staring at the rain which was racing down the glass. The brief respite had ceased and the storm had returned.

"I'll tell you anything you want to know about myself, Sue," he said at last. "I've led about the usual sort of life, I suppose—usual to a fellow who's had a bit too much money, and precious little family life. There are plenty of things I'd like to have clotted out; plenty I'm ashamed of; but after all, it's something that I am ashamed, isn't it? It means that I've outgrown any desire I'd had to—well, to be otherwise than a decent sort of guy, a—as good a husband and—as father as I can be."

"Isn't that, Bob? Whatever you were before I knew you, belongs to you; it doesn't concern me. I've always said I'd never require my husband to unfold any chapter of his past. If it was unworthy of him, it would hurt me to hear about it. And most people grow by making mistakes, I think."

"And what mistakes have you made, sweet Sue?" He turned to her, his novel expression of seriousness wiped from his face as though it had never been. "What hideous and world-shaking mistakes have you made, my darling?"

"That's just it, Bob! I've made lots of them, but they haven't been especially important. That's why I'm so awfully young inside. That—and because Allen always shielded me; protected me."

"Thank heaven he did! I loathe having a lacquered little sophisticated woman like you—"

She interrupted him nervously. "Bob, it's simply pouring again! And we'll have to leave this minute if I'm to be home by the time Allen comes!"

Shopping

WITH the first days of spring, Patsy's lethargy left her. She began to shop day after day. Maggie, her mouth pursed disapprovingly, would take in dress boxes at the door; gather up the paper and string Mrs. Davenport scattered about when she opened her recent purchases.

Allen came in one afternoon to find the living-room strewn with lingerie, with frocks dangling by their hangers from the central chandelier, with satin sandals and white sports shoes spilling out of their cardboard boxes.

"What's all this? Been buying the stores out, Patsy?"

He looked a little uneasy. "I suppose it's all right? I suppose we can afford all this? It seems a little—excessive to me, but no doubt—everything gave out at once. You—you paid for everything, Patsy?"

She looked honestly surprised. "Paid for them? Using what for money, lover?"

"Using your allowance for money?" It was the first time Sue had heard him speak sharply to his wife. "We settled all that at the time we were married. If you really haven't bought anything since then, you should have plenty in the bank—even for all this."

Patsy laughed. "You're funny, Allen! This is my whole spring outfit, don't you understand? I couldn't possibly pay for it with what I've saved. Besides," she went on easily. "I haven't saved to any conspicuous extent. There've been things I needed—perfume and powder and things—"

"I should think you could buy a good deal of powder and perfume on sixty-five dollars a month, Patsy! That's your dress allowance. Do I understand you've charged all this?"

"Why, yes! I have to have something to wear, I'm your wife, Allen; I have to do you credit."

He was collecting the carbon expense slips from the waste basket, from where they had fallen on the floor.

"Great guns! Here's one for a hundred and forty-seven dollars, and twenty-eight cents—at one fell swoop! And this—Patsy! This must be a mistake: seven hats at one place, the total being sixty-five dollars! Will you tell me what you need of seven hats at one and the same time?"

"Sue, her cheeks burning, slipped from the room, closing the door silently behind her. She had known that Patsy was on a spending spree; that she had lost her head in buying right and left without regard to her needs or Allen's income. She had remonstrated in vain. Patsy had simply gone off without her and continued her mad career."

"Actually Quarrelling"

AND there was far more to it than Allen knew. Certain boxes had been delivered to her sisters; suits, hats, absurdly sheer stockings, jewelry and secret even.

"Oh, that was a spring coat I got for Marie," she said composedly. "And, Letty, poor child, was almost barefooted. I outfitted her with shoes."

"Your sisters have positions; they earn salaries of their own!"

"When is more than yours does, Allen darling?"

"Patsy, I'm sorry to seem ungenerous, but you must never do this again. It will all summer to clean up these bills. As a matter of fact, I'll have to forego our vacation this year. Sorry, dear. I know you'd counted on that trip. But no traveling for us now!"

"She cried out protestingly. 'Allen Davenport! Not to go to Canada as we planned! But it was to be our wedding trip. We never even stayed away over night when we were married. You said you'd make it up to me this summer. You asked me whether I'd rather have a used car or a month in Canada, and I said Canada. You can't go back on your word like this!'"

"But darling, figure it out for yourself! I have just so much money—you know that. If it has to be used to pay for outfits for you and your sisters, it's a dead sure thing it can't be used to take us to Canada. You've been a business woman. You know that a dollar can't be spent twice."

Her reddened mouth closed with soft viciousness.
