NEW YARDSTICK REVEALS FOOD NEED OF CHILD

Chart and Graph System Is Applied to Nutritional Problem—Held Simple

Cleveland, O.—(UP)—Development of a radically new method of measuring child nutrition here is believed to have ended years of search by physicians for an accurate yardstick of nutrition.

The method, outlined by Dr. Norman C. Wetzel, associate professor of pediatrics at Western Reserve university, is based on the direct study of 2,023 Cleveland school children and records of more than 4,000,000 children during the past 100 years.

The system involves the use of a "grid" or chart into which any child can be fitted.

Preliminary application of the chart indicated that 15 of every 100 local school children either are inadequately nourished or are in need of comprehensive medical examination. The record was believed comparable to that existing generally in the United States.

Easily Applied Dr. Wetzel said that unlike all previous systems, it has proved both accurate and easily applied. He said that it offered an answer to the serious problem of selecting the city's malnourished children, a problem which thwarted health officers seeking to prove the effects of Cleveland's relief crisis on child health.

He pointed out that most systems have been either too elaborate for practical use or have failed to allow for the extent to which a particular child can depart from average physical characteristics and still be nourished properly and in good health.

He said the feature of the system is the "grid" by which the child's "nutritional grade" is established. It was designed specifically to be applied by such workers as school nurses, requires very little time for each child, and necessitates only a minimum amount of calculation.

Classifications Set Up The chart utilizes the child's height and weight to determine the physical type with which he should be classed and then the child is fitted into the "grid" according to his physical and nutritional state, such as overnourished, stocky, good, fair, borderline or poor.

Dr. Wetzel, who has published a number of previous papers on child physical development, plotted nearly 2,000 children studied at Harvard university and examined all important records of the sort in calibrating the graph.

He pointed out that previous work by Lewis has been found to be "very conspicuously" in diagnosing malnutrition.
