Ye Poets Corner

Old Covered Wagon
Old covered wagon there lies a tale, How you crossed the plains in '52; As your wheels rolled and chucked along Toward a land unknown, untamed and new, If your tongue could speak then you could tell, Of a story that you know full well.

How the Indians lurked on the plains, And the water holes were far between; But hopes were high and their hearts were strong Though food was low and the oxen lean; While snug inside in soft feather beds, The children were safe from arrowheads.

The trails grew dim as the days grew long, Though they had slowly traveled afar; At eve they'd follow the setting sun, At night they were guided by a star; When campfires shone in the skies above, They spoke of hopes and courage, and love.

Then tired and dusty from the trip, The train laid over for seven days, For the men to search for wood and game, For women to wash and stock to graze.

Then one morning just at break of dawn, Wheels were rolling and chuckling on.

You crossed the river's dangerous curves, Though holes were treacherous, dark and deep; Their clothes were wet and the blankets, too, The night was cold and they could not sleep; They huddled beneath your bed and bow,

Away from the wind and sleet and snow, They found their way through the mountain pass, Though the trip was slow, and hard and long; The trek was over the journey through, And their hearts were glad and gay and strong;

Then they pitched their tents beneath a tree, Where the winds blew wild and fresh and free.

With courage renewed they set to work, And cut down trees for the table's legs; They schemed and managed the best they could, Though they had no meat, nor milk nor eggs.

Through the desert's heat or storms worst spell, Ever and always you served them well.

Now your top is torn, your wheels are dished, Your brake is locked and its rods are bent; And on your bed where the children slept There's many a bruise, and scar and dent.

A clip is gone from the whiffletree, That was shaped out on the lone prairie. You always stand for you won't lay down, Though you served your day and done full well; And your modest tongue will never speak Of the tale I'd love to hear you tell.

A tale that will live long after you, Of the trek you made in '52. Jane Garrett, Eagle Point, Aug. 27.
