AGRONOMIST SEES FINE FUTURE FOR MEDFORD LEGUME

Mr. O. S. Aamodt, head agronomist, division of forage crops and diseases, U. S. department of agriculture, Washington, D. C., in company with H. A. Schott, divisional representative in the Pacific northwest, were in Medford today on a trip through southern Oregon.

"It is generally agreed," Mr. Aamodt said, "that there is a great need for crop adjustment in the United States, not only for the purpose of avoiding production of surplus crops, but also, for soil improvement and conservation. The necessary crop adjustments can best be made with grasses and legumes."

"It is essential that the production be based on efficient cultural practices. Basic to efficient cultural practices in all crops is adapted varieties. This factor has been emphasized in the action programs throughout the country," he continued.

"In the Medford region and in other sections of the Pacific northwest, the State College of Agriculture, and the federal department of agriculture, working in cooperation with leading farmers, have demonstrated the excellent adaptation of Lotus to the soil and climatic conditions prevalent."

"Lotus Corniculatus is a legume exceptionally well adapted to the wide variety of soil and climatic conditions, and management treatments, when compared with other legumes commonly grown in the region. I think that Dr. George Clements of Los Angeles, has adequately described the value of this plant to agriculture as follows:

"My own opinion is that it seems to be just what the stockmen have always hoped for; a forage plant of weed persistence and tenacity, hardy, resistant to drought, yet tolerant to wet soil; a legume of quality feed value and great tonnage, a plant sought after by all stock."

"This development should go a long way toward obtaining the objectives set for the crop adjustment and soil improvement programs, and at the same time, provide cheap, nutritious feed for the livestock industry."

Also in the company of Mr. Aamodt were Roger Morse, dairy extension specialist, Oregon State college, R. G. Fowler, county agent, and his brother, Tom Fowler of Amery, Wis.

The group made inspections of the Hoover-Poston grass nurseries near Medford and Eagle Point. The harvest will start in about 30 days on these nurseries of 500 acres of grass. Lotus was threshed there last year for the first time, and has taken its place as one of the leading legumes of the United States.

What do you mean—"It's the Water?"

Just this—the character of a beer depends on the water used in its brewing. At our Olympia Brewery is a rare and precious phenomenon of Nature—subterranean water with properties that make it possible to here brew a beer comparable with the famous products of the brewers of Burton and Munich.

Moody can buy fine equipment and quality ingredients. Experience and skill can combine these two into beer. But at Olympia is found water whose natural purity and superior brewing quality make Olympia a different and a better beer.
