AERIAL PHOTOS TO AID FOREST FIRE FIGHTERS

Portable Darkroom Offers Speed in Forming Strategy to Battle Blazes

Bakersfield, Cal., (U.P.)—Aerial reconnaissance and photography may become increasingly important as an aid to fighting forest fires if a portable tent darkroom under experimentation here proves its worth.

The portable darkroom makes it possible for fire fighters in the field to determine the exact location and severity of mountain blazes in a few minutes time, according to the men who originated it. They are Frank Scovel, fire prevention engineer for the county state fire department, and Harold Bowhay, county fire warden.

Negatives by 'Chute A fire may be photographed from an airplane, the undeveloped negatives dropped by parachute to ground crews. The films are developed in the small tent darkroom right on the line of battle.

Scovel estimated that with the portable equipment the chief of a fire crew can have a completed print of a forest fire within seven minutes after the airplane cameraman snaps the shutter.

The information that can be gleaned from such a photograph is extremely valuable in planning suppression activities and selecting the point of attack, according to Bowhay.

Portable Generator The films are contained in a sealed tube during their downward flight. Once on the ground, the tube is opened by the crew boss in the darkroom and the film removed and developed.

Prints are made with an electric light, the power being supplied by a portable generator.

From the photographs, the ground crews obtain information as to the terrain, the character and trend of the fire and its exact location in mountainous areas.

Immediately after a fire is reported, a forest service plane takes off to scout the terrain. Meanwhile, fire fighting crews move up by road and establish a base near the blaze. There the films are received and developed.
