Here is SUGAR
no enemy can touch

YOU'RE LOOKING at a sugar beet. With Philippine sugar cut off, with a need to send sugar to our allies and perhaps also turn much sugar into gunpowder, the sugar beet has now become America's most important single source of sugar.

Last year the sugar beet furnished one-quarter of all the sugar the U. S. consumed. Last year 65,000 western farmers grew this vital crop.

This year sugar beet acreage is being increased. The industry and the government are working night and day to make this increase as big as possible.

In the meantime, it is necessary that sugar be rationed, for these reasons:

- Because increases in beet sugar cannot as yet make up the loss of Philippine and other cane sugar.
- Because America must supply its allies with sugar—and do this in addition to supplying our own people with sugar.

• Because our factories can utilize sugar to make the industrial alcohol with which smokeless powder is manufactured. In order to get enough explosives quick, we may have to turn over 1,000,000 tons of sugar into alcohol. Some sugar is being used for that purpose right now.

Let's remember several things as we cut down on sugar to the ration level. First, let's remember the cup-or-so of sugar we save each week by rationing may—as gunpowder—save an American boy's life.

Second, let's remember that we are not being asked to give up much—the proposed sugar ration is larger than the one we had back in 1918.

And lastly, let's remember that, while we are cutting down on sugar under the ration, we will never have to go without sugar. Because we now grow sugar in our own country—in the form of billions of sugar beets like the one pictured at the right.

The sugar beet is long and tapering, silver-white in color. It is different from the small red table beet often grown in home gardens.
