Officers for Navy to Be Sought Here For Radar Branch

Seeking qualified technical men with college training to serve as commissioned naval officers on assignments of a highly confidential nature, Lieut. H. E. Wigle, aide to the director of naval officer procurement in Seattle, will be at the Chamber of Commerce here all day Wednesday and Thursday to interview applicants.

Lieutenant Wigle is seeking officers for the navy's new Radar branch which deals with equipment a full step ahead of television in radio development. Men who qualify will be given five months intensive training on the use and maintenance of such equipment—a training course at government expense which is the equivalent of two years advanced college work.

These men will be commissioned as officers immediately and upon graduation from their training courses will be assigned to duty on new secret devices to perform a highly important part in the navy's war plans. Lieutenant Wigle said amateur radio operators with college training, physicists, electrical engineers, experts on electronics and others trained in mathematics or physics are eligible.

At the close of the first World war, U. S. marines had been awarded 1,660 decorations by nine allied countries.
