

400 NEWSPAPERS OF RECENT BIRTH, AND ALL IN ARMY

Officers Say Camp Publications Do Fine Work—
Old Rules Are Revised.

By John Grover
(Wide World Features Writer)

Washington—When Pvt. Joe Anybody joins the Army, he keeps one civilian trait—he still likes to see his name in print.

Four hundred Army newspapers—ranging from typewritten handbills to ambitious journals edited by ex-professionals—are keeping Pvt. Anybody and his 2,000,000 comrades posted on the goings-on in their military "home towns."

Morale officers say the camp newspapers are doing a whale of a job keeping the soldiery perked up. A rookie begins to throw off his initial homesickness when he begins to read about his own company or his own regiment. Then he's part of something real. It's like seeing the name of his old firm or his old college.

From then on, they're regular readers of the camp paper, and better soldiers. There's a squawk if any outfit is missed in distribution of the sheet.

Putting out a camp newspaper is a job to make a civilian publisher go quietly nuts. The ordinary problems of publishing are multiplied manifold. The Fort Meade "Post" is a typical camp paper, under the supervision of Maj. Francis E. Lutz.

Here are some of the problems Maj. Lutz recalls the "Post" has had to take in stride. First, the old "who, what, where, when" basis of journalism must be revised and pruned. "Who" and "what" are all right sometimes, but "where" and "when" are out most of the time. Pvt. Anybody might send a copy of the camp paper home, and proud Ma Anybody would probably show it to Mrs. Backfence, who'd tell it to her bridge club. That means the whereabouts of the Upstenth division on such-and-such a date could become common talk in Berlin.

Getting news from the brass hats is tougher in the Army, too. In civilian life, a reporter can sit on the edge of the mayor's desk and say, in effect, "Listen, Fatty, what gives?" Corporal Reporter can't do that to a camp "mayor." In all probability a major general who's more than somewhat touchy about his rank.

The staffs of most camp newspapers are enlisted men, with officers in very remote control. They operate on the wise assumption that men in the ranks can write the stuff that other men in the ranks want to read. On the "Post," there are four enlisted men reporters, who rotate as managing editors, and a photographer.

They're "leg men" in a very real sense. The Army doesn't furnish cars or taxis for soldier-reporters. They hoof from one end of the cantonment to the other. Even during maneuvers in the field, when they performed regular duties the "Post" staff didn't miss an edition—but they had to commandeer a horse to rush it 300 miles for distribution once.

Keeping a staff together is one of the tough problems of army publishing. The "Post" has graduated half a dozen to officer training schools. Others get sudden orders to move to that "where" that can't be mentioned. Picture the dilemma of a managing editor, just before press time, with half his staff ordered one way and most of his subscribers entraining another.

"X" Division originally was stationed at Fort Meade. It's gone "somewhere" for advanced training. However, the "Post" still remains its "home town" newspaper, and goes to the men regularly every week. "Y" Division is training at Meade now, so the paper contains news both for its "alumni" group and its "undergraduates" still in training there.

The number of papers sent home zooms up when promotion lists are printed. That's when the most names appear. Pvt. Anybody is just like everybody else—he gets a kick out of seeing his name in the paper, and wants his folks to see it too.
