

MRS. MURDOCK TAKES A CASE

by George Harmon Cox

Chapter 27 'Just Nervous'

ALL along Joyce had told herself that Ward Allen could not have killed Clarke, but this she realized now, was simply because such a conclusion was the one she wanted to believe. There was no logic in such a belief; she was trying to reason with her emotions. Della's happiness, her life even, would be ruined; therefore Ward was not guilty. And yet "Even if he did," Thorndike was saying, "we're all going to stick by him. We'll see him through this."

"If he killed him he was justified," Della said resolutely. "He must have had good reason to. I won't believe he did and even if I'm wrong it won't make any difference. I love him."

"Well, it's no good worrying about it yet," Thorndike said. "He's still in front of Della's apartment house."

Joyce and Della got out and thanked him. When they entered the foyer they found Jack Fenner waiting for them. He looked very neat and well-groomed, his hat was in his hand, and his upward-slanting eyes observed them deliberately.

"I got here a little early," he said. They went upstairs, taking off hats and coats and settling down in the living room. Della got a box of cigarettes and an ashtray and put them on the table beside Fenner's chair, and he watched her move about, his smile of approval constant.

Conversational going was awkward for the new few minutes. They talked of this and that, and Fenner asked Joyce where Kent was, and she explained, and the quiet crept up on them again.

"You haven't told him?" Fenner asked. "About this?" Joyce said. "No, I told you I wouldn't."

Della stood up and walked over to the windows. Joyce and Fenner watched her and when she became aware of their inspection her face twisted in a rueful smile and came back.

"Just nervous," she said. "That's okay," Fenner said. "You've got a right to be."

"You'd like a drink, wouldn't you?" "Now that you mention it," said Fenner, grinning. "I think I would."

"I can get it," Joyce said. "In one of the lower cupboards," Della said. Fenner pulled himself from the chair. "I'll go with you."

In the kitchen Joyce found a bottle of Scotch. "I'll get you some ice."

"Never mind," Fenner said. "Ice dilutes it."

Long Wait HE poured whisky in the glass and added some water from the faucet. He rolled some of the mixture around in his mouth, said: "Ahh," and drank. Leaning against the sink, he held the glass up and studied it.

"When're you going to tell me the rest of it?" The question brought Joyce up with a start.

"But I've already told you." He looked at her, one brow up. "Have you?" he said; then, removing the pressure of his glance. "All right. Whenever you're ready."

They went back to the living room and found Della pacing the floor. Joyce sat down and glanced at her watch. It was ten minutes of twelve.

"You know what you're going to say?" Fenner was watching Della and she stopped, waiting. "You have the envelope?" "Oh!" Della put her hand to her mouth. "But I haven't!" She looked at Joyce. "I mean—"

"She can get it," Joyce said. "How long'll it take?" "Twenty minutes." "Oh," Fenner said slowly. "So you've got it?" Joyce started to deny this but changed her mind. "Yes."

Fenner leaned back. "Okay," he said. Joyce looked at her watch. Twelve o'clock. Della looked at her watch.

"It's time," she said. Fenner finished his drink and they waited. The quiet expanded until it became stifling. Della could not sit still for more than a minute at a time, and finally Joyce could no longer bear to look at her. Twelve ten, now: twelve eleven, twelve twelve.

The sound of the telephone bell was a physical shock to Joyce, jarring her nerves so that for the first second or two she could not move. Neither could Della. She gasped and the blood drained from her face and she looked helplessly at Fenner.

"All right," he said, a snap in his voice. "This may be it." He came out of his chair, touching her shoulder.

Joyce watched her lift the instrument, heard her say: "Yes," and then froze on the edge of her chair, holding her breath.

No Dice IT took forever for the next word to come. "Oh," Della said, and that was enough to tell Joyce something was wrong. Never had she heard such relief come from one small syllable.

"Yes," Della said, color tinting her cheeks again. "All right. Thank you, Uncle Dean." She hung up and smiled weakly.

"False alarm, huh?" Fenner said. "He said it was all right," she told Joyce. "About the lawyer."

Joyce leaned back, aware that her muscles were aching. There was a dampness in her palms, and she was angry with herself for letting the suspense do such things to her.

"I was scared to death," Della said. "I'll say you were," Fenner said. At one o'clock Fenner stood up. "I guess it's no dice," he said. "Something must have gone wrong with his plans."

A look of alarm came over Della's face. "But what will we do?" "Nothing."

"You think he's not going to call?" "There's no good in hanging around for it. We don't know what the score is so there's no use—"

"But if he goes to the police?" "Why should he?" Joyce said. "He should have called me first. If he wanted the envelope the other day he must still want it. Something made him change his mind about calling at twelve. He may have seen me or he may be playing cagey."

"You think he'll call again?" "I do, but we can't tell when. I'll stay close to the office the rest of the day and if you should get word, let me know. It'll take you a half hour to get the envelope anyway and I can be around by that time. The thing is, you've waited an hour and he didn't keep his date and if he should call and find you out he'll know why and wait until he can call again. It's okay for you to wait if you want to, but there's no point in my sticking around until you have something."

"I suppose you're right," Della said, "but just the same I think I'll stay right here."

Joyce picked up her hat and coat. "Come on," she ordered. "Lunch."

Della shook her head. "I'm going to wait."

Not on an empty stomach you're not," Joyce said firmly struck sparks. "Wait a minute! What is this? You tell me—"

The cheetah, trained by sportsmen in Europe, is often called the "hunting leopard" because it is used in the chase both in Africa and India. Resembling a dog in many respects, its claws are short and stubby, and are not retractile like those of other felines. In India the cheetah is trained and handled like a falcon, being blindfolded and lashed until game is sighted, whereupon it darts away and soon brings down even the fleetest of antelopes. Probably the fastest animal in the world, it has been clocked at speeds up to 70 miles an hour over 100-yard courses!
