USO Camera Clubbers Try Hand At Glamor Shots of Junior Hostesses

Riverside USO's camera club members recently took time from their still life and nature pictures to shoot glamour shots of Junior Hostess Marianne Casper who lives at 650 Pine street. Under the skilled direction of one soldier who had done publicity stunts for Universal Studio, lights and cameras were set up on the stage of the USO auditorium, and G.I.'s began to click their shutters.

Prize for the best shot, shown here, went to Pfc. George E. Rathbun of WPRC at Camp White.

Miss Casper is the daughter of Mrs. Ira Woolfolk of Brownsboro, and is employed in Medford at the office of Dr. C. H. Paske.

The USO camera club is currently cutting and editing motion picture film taken in the past of USO activities, it Marianne Casper was announced by Sgt. Leslie Myers, club president.

Japs Say Invasion Following Plans of Nazi Command

Tokyo radio, attributing its information to German military headquarters, declared Thursday that continued Allied landings in France were exactly what "the original strategy of the German high command" had planned.

The Japanese broadcast, heard by United Press in San Francisco, explained it this way:

"The original strategy of the German high command was to allow the invading forces to draw as far as possible to the German lines and then annihilate them.

"Fighting in northern France during the past two days is developing according to German expectations.

"On the second day of the invasion the enemy kept landing reinforcements—and that is just what the Germans hoped for because the enemy casualties will be proportionately larger."

Olive Barber's Observations

Ivan is the elevator boy in the hotel at which I'm now staying here in Seattle. Ivan will run elevators only until he is well enough to go back into the navy. He got safely through six major engagements in the South Pacific but not the seventh. A Jap bomb hit the ship between the first and second turrets. After that the ship didn't have a bow.

Ivan didn't get hit but became a casualty of that disaster just the same. For batteries, when submerged in salt water, create chlorine. And a lot of batteries got submerged when the bow of the ship went down. The deadly gas swept through the ship and did terrible things to the boys' lungs. So Ivan was sent home.

He says that when fighting is actually in process, the boys are too busy to be frightened, but frankly admit they're scared to death during the time they're on the alert, waiting for action.

The fight starts when the radar reports the approach of the enemy. It increases as the radar tells them the foe is nearer; then nearer. The boys' stomachs are hard knots. Then suddenly the enemy arrives and fear is gone; action takes its place.

Ivan is 20. "Once, on shore leave, I got married. It didn't take." As he stated this, his eyes weren't 20; they were as old as Time. One engagement on land had aged those eyes more than seven at sea.

"Why did you get married?" I asked.

"I don't know!" and I saw he was still puzzled over how it had come about. "It wasn't that I hadn't seen girls; we were in Australia for weeks and saw lots of them. I think when the boys get married, they don't marry the particular girl who takes their name. They marry a dream; a dream of someone to whom they'll really matter; to whom they'll be the most important person on earth. In the navy you're not an individual. The set-up doesn't make that possible.

"Also, when a fellow thinks of a girl, she gets mixed up with things like never being scared any more; a girl means no more gunfire; no more seeing the guy beside you have his guts shot out. A girl isn't just a girl. She's your mother and the groceryman and Saturday night dances and stuff like that. So you marry her and find she isn't those things at all."

"And I saw that while chlorine had hurt Ivan's lungs, it was nothing to what marriage had done to his heart.

"Someone's calling on the sixth floor, Ma'am; sorry to leave you," said Ivan.

the Pacific coast, church officials announced.

Delegates to the conference, representing some 375 churches from Bakersfield north, voted approximately 425 to 75 in favor of giving loyal Japanese the same freedom of movement as "other Americans and allens of other countries," the announcement said.

The first Victory Suggestion Award, the highest honor to be given a civilian employee of the War department for practical suggestions to speed the winning of the war, was presented to Dayton R. Ludwig of the Office of the Chief of Transportation Army Service Forces for devising a new and improved method of loading army ordnance material on railroad flat cars.

Approximately 4,500,000,000 jars of food were canned in American homes in 1943, according to the War Production Board.
