

ROBOT BOMBING LIKE GIGANTIC PINBALL BOARD

Germans Send "Ball" Hurtling at England but Never Score—Play for Keeps

By Jack Frankish
United Press War Correspondent
Southern England, June 22—(U.P.)—Imagine a giant pinball machine covering hundreds of square miles. Every time the ball lights a bumper there is the flash of an explosion.
Scores of miles away a little band of Germans is playing the game—and your home is one of the bumpers they are trying to light. Or at least you are sure they are aiming for you. And the "ball" is one of the German robot bombs.

Play for Keeps
But there is a difference between this grisly game and a peaceful one in the corner drug-store. This one is "for keeps."
There is one consolation. The Germans can't see the bumpers when they light and they never know the score.

This game of wrecked homes and churches, of sudden death and mangled bodies has been going on for nearly a week now and millions of English civilians are in "front lines" again, as close to danger as their fathers, husbands, and sons across the channel in Normandy.

All of us learned quickly to adapt ourselves to this new life under attack. It doesn't take long to develop the technique for diving flat on your stomach—preferably under a table and as far away from windows and mirrors as possible—when you hear the roar of an approaching bomb.

Peculiar Sound
A motorcycle or truck motor will make you prick up your ears for a moment but when you hear the flying bomb you know by its unmistakable "washing machine" sound, especially when it is flying too close for comfort.

When you hear the motor go silent, look out the window and see the robot bomb diving to earth a couple of hundreds yards away, you forget completely how ridiculous you must look as you dive for cover.

Not since the blitz have the English civilians been under such constant attack. The robot bomb offensive began last Thursday night and although there are occasional lulls when no jet-propelled explosives fall in your own district for hours, you never can be sure night or day when the next one will be coming your way.
