HEALTH TALKS
By

BODY MECHANICS

Proper body mechanics is one of the first essentials to normal health. It follows that the first consideration in the preservation of health is the maintaining of the bodily tissues in their proper mechanical relations. By this it is not meant to infer that life is a mechanical process. However, the life force cannot normally manifest itself in a human body whose parts are in an abnormal mechanical relation. We all know that an auto does not function normally with its parts in disrelation. Then, certainly, we should not expect the human body to function to its best advantage while its parts and tissues are in a state of abnormal relationship.

Your body is a sensitive mechanical organism. Keep it in repair. See that its parts operate smoothly and easily. Have its abnormalities corrected. Do this before irreparable damage results.

Brief Filed In Court Pleads For Long-Suffering Indians

By M. F. Small
United Press Staff Correspondent

Sacramento, Calif.—(UPI)—A legal brief illustrated by black and white cartoon-style drawings was added to the archives of California recently.

It was prepared by Attorney General Robert W. Kenny for submission to the United States court of claims in a suit brought by his department 15 years ago on behalf of the Indian natives of California. It is written in narrative style.

After California was seized from Mexico in 1848, a three-man commission representing the government of the United States conducted treaty negotiations with the tribal chiefs of the 110,000 Indians, which resulted in an agreement to set aside 8,518,900 acres of land for reservations. Great supplies of food, livestock, tools and clothing were also to be delivered in return for cessions by the tribes of all their land rights in the state.

The Indians were to have the services of agents, doctors, teachers, farmers and carpenters in what the Kenny brief describes as "a complete plan for the education and support of the tribes in order to fit them eventually to earn their livelihood in a civilized state."

But as the treaties were being negotiated, the westward trek of gold seekers, starting in 1848, had brought to California by 1852 an estimated 200,000 persons—double the Indian population.

The legislature of the new state by resolution in 1852 called upon congress to decline to approve the treaties. One of the pioneer lawmakers, a Senator Coats, had reported that 20,000 American citizens were already residing within the boundaries of the proposed reservations, and that the lands were worth at least 100 million dollars in mineral and other resources.

Congress did reject the treaties. The Indians were left "exposed, helpless and largely unprotected to ruthless eviction, unprovoked aggression, bitter persecution, conscienceless exploitation, dispossession and despoilment of their property without recourse, to become homeless wanderers in the lands of their fathers."

No more poignant and pathetic story could be penned, the Kenny brief declares, "than that of the Indians of California during the first three decades of American occupation following 1848. In the bitter struggle for existence, thousands perished in despair as the result of unprovoked war, massacre, disease and famine."

After rejection of the treaties, the federal government adopted a policy of dealing with the problem through congressional legislation. Indian affairs were placed in the Department of Interior Indian bureau.

Four reservations were created in 1856, and a day school was established on one of them in 1868.

But, according to Kenny, "the records will show, and this fact is at the root of all the tragic injustice inflicted upon the Indians, that the lands given to them were... isolated, largely without water, ill-adapted to agriculture."

In 1905, the treaties, which had been filed as "secret," were brought to light by clerks of the U. S. senate.

The Commonwealth Club and other California groups became active in the succeeding years in focusing attention on the unfortunate situation of the Indians. Free legal service was provided for the Indians when in 1927 the legislature authorized the attorney general to bring suit against the United States in the court of claims on their behalf.

In due time, congress authorized the suit.

As matters now stand, Attorney General Kenny has proposed a stipulation under which all prior claims would be settled for $5,165,624.48. Further relief would be sought through direct congressional appropriation.

The total value of the land, goods and services promised to the Indians by the treaty negotiators is estimated to have been $17,816,624.48 at the time, but the lower figure was reached by crediting the government with the value of benefits obtained by the Indians since 1852.

The court of claims refused to allow any money interest.

According to the Kenny calculations, a settlement somewhere between 17.8 and 25.6 million dollars is necessary if a reasonable full measure of justice is to be rendered.

The attorney general is mailing a copy of the brief to each member of congress and hopes they will be influenced to provide substantial relief for the Indians of California.

He is sure that they will find it interesting reading, and that the illustrations, drawn by an artist named Antonio Sotomayor, will also amuse them.

It is the only brief the state printing office has ever prepared that includes a "comic section."
