EVERYBODY HAS BLOOD PRESSURE

One grumpy old boy summoned me to his office and told me I'd have to change my teachings about catching cold. He didn't know anything about the scientific medical points of the question but he knew from many years of experience that if he walked the few blocks from his office to his club for lunch without his overshoes on, when the pavement was even a little damp, he was practically certain to...

The only reason for these talks about blood pressure is that now I'm having trouble with another great man in another large city. He has a mad on about my constant harping on the importance of saving the teeth, supplementing the everyday deficient diet with the essential vitamins and being on guard against mouth spray as the usual mode of infection with "colds." The great man even asserts that mothers of small children are complaining about the demoralizing influence of my teachings—for instance, when I assure youngsters you get your feet wet or not, so far as health is concerned, being presumably a person of common ordinary intelligence I ought to know better than that. Etc., etc. So the question is, shall I become a mere memory or shall I pipe down, pull in my horns, and make all my teachings conform to the conventions or standards of, say, 1890? Take this blood pressure thing.

SUBURBAN HEIGHTS By GUYAS WILLIAMS When Fred Perley saw his wife leaving the party forgetting her pocketbook as usual, he slipped it into his coat to give her a lesson, and did not produce it until she had left and she had chided herself sufficiently for her forgetfulness. Unfortunately for his lesson, he found it was someone else's pocketbook.
