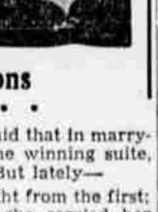
Olive Barber's Observations



• • •

I've always said that in marrying, hearts is the winning suite, not diamonds. But lately—

I liked her right from the first; liked the way she carried her slim lithe body; liked the persistent laughter in the brown eyes and especially liked the way they'd sort of glow when she spoke of her three children.

Now in her late 20's, she was left a widow several years ago. Her life since then hasn't been an easy one, what with being on her job six days a week, picking up the children at a friend's house on the way home and then flying into housework, getting supper for the four of them, then seeing the boys had clean blouses for the next day and the little girl a freshly laundered dress.

Changed from slacks to a house dress, she liked to think that their evenings, at least, were much as those they'd have had had Bill lived. Neighbor children came in and there were games and later hot cocoa. Sometimes she got pretty mad at herself that the noise hurt her head and that her laughter at their antics was forced rather than spontaneous. Kids had a right to a jolly mother.

Then the first thing she knew there were two men in her life. Both want to marry her. There is Bob, a little under her own age, and Hal many years her senior. Though there are two men in her life, there is only one in her heart—Bob. It was about all this that she talked to me, as sometimes a young woman will be drawn to do to an older one.

"Just to have Bob near me sets my heart racing. I hadn't known I could ever feel that way again. I'd marry him tomorrow if it weren't for the children. But Bob and I would have to start from scratch and by the time we got on our feet, they'd be through school and gone. With Hal things would be different. He's older and already has a successful business. The girl could take music lessons; the boys could go to summer camps with no thought of the expense.

"The kids like to go fishing with Bob but the little rascals sure like the trips Hal gives us and the things he buys for them, the little gold-diggers," and her laughter was tender though a bit shaky. "I like Hal, too. He's kind and thoughtful and I know he loves me. But, oh, Bob!"

I'm a softy. I still think hearts are trump.
