The Double Cluster of Stars in Perseus

By J. Hugh Pruett
Astronomer, General Extension Division, University of Oregon

The astronomy students had finished their work at the observatory and all had gone their devious ways into the night. Alone under the stars, we had put away and locked most of the telescopes—all excepting one —when came the desire to take a last fond look at the object over which the young people had most enthused during the evening. This was the splendid double cluster of tiny stars in the constellation of Perseus.

The Perseus cluster to the unaided eye is a dim nebulous spot midway between the principal stars of the groups Cassiopeia and Perseus. At about 8 p. m. at this time of year this cluster may be easily located.

Trace from straight overhead a short distance down toward the northeast. Soon we come to five fairly-bright stars arranged in the form of a rather awkward letter W. This is Cassiopeia. Still lower, three stars in a slightly curved line mark the body of Perseus. Between these groups in a region of only dim stars, good eyes on clear moonless nights may detect a small, faint, cloudy patch—truly an unpretentious object.

What a complete transformation is the telescopic sight! The circular field of view is alive with glittering little stars, dozens and scores of them, most of which are in two charming clusters near opposite sides of the field. Some appear quite bright, others dim, still others such mere pin points of light on the background of dark blue that they go and come at intervals. On good twinkling nights, their rapid scintillations remind one of a swarm of very busy bees. Every one of them is working hard, even the tiniest, energetically trying to do its bit in the program of the mighty universe.

One of the clusters is especially fascinating. In its center are two stars, much brighter than the others, which give the appearance of a rather wide double. Very close to one of these there is a very small half circle of faint stars in a very delicate pattern—on the other side a tangled mass of tiny stars. When the air is very clear and the observer watches carefully, the beauty of this picture is enhanced by the irregular appearance now and then throughout the group of the tiniest of the tiny stellar points, as though sharp needles were pricking the curtain of night and letting through the merest intimations of the infinite light "beyond the stars."

Olive Barber's Observations

An aimless walk taken early this morning finally led me to a a street lined with ramshackle houses. Steps were missing or broken; window blinds hung askew, curtains were limp and dirty and unnecessary as no one could have seen through the film-covered window panes. Porch floors had missing boards and brown paint scaled from the walls like dandruff from a dirty man's bald head.

Then I saw the door! A golden door, a new door; varnished and with its glass ashine, its brass letter slot glinting in the sun. Compared to neighboring doors, it was like a gold tooth in a set of snagged and decaying molars. Almost I knocked on the magnificent new door to see what manner of person lived behind it; almost but not quite. There are some lengths to which even I won't go.

Along the window ledge of a nearby apartment was a row of gay bits of pottery. There was pathos in this reaching out for beauty; as there always is to me in the rows of scraggly houseplants potted in old tin cans one sometimes sees on floathouses repellant with damp decay. Those small potteries were, to this tenement dweller, a substitute for the growing things which conditions perhaps denied her.

Yet another window; a window where hung a square of white on which were five blue stars. For all I knew the boys those stars represented might that very moment be representing me on some battlefield, muddy and tired and hungry; even wounded. For all I knew one might even then be passing through a door more golden than the one nearby; a door through which he'd pass and not return.

Just then, as though it had been planned to have it so, church bells rang from a distant steeple, each peal a promise of fair and gentle things to come. And because I am of the earth, these promises seemed not for another world, but for this one; promises to the five who'd gone from this home that they would return. Call it wishful thinking or what you will, I knew.

An elderly woman came hurriedly out of the door; made a funny awkward salute to the five-starred square of white, then almost ran in the direction from whence had come the sound of church bells. There was neither fear nor sadness on her face. Maybe she knew too.
