INDEPENDENCE IN LIFE NAVY'S AIM FOR BLIND, DEAF

Philadelphia, Pa.—(U.P.)—Men of the U. S. fleet coming out of the war without sight or hearing are receiving the best substitutes for eyes and ears that the navy can provide.

These substitutes consist not only of a hearing-aid or a seeing-eye dog, but also a feeling of confidence, independence, and a place in the future.

Here at the Philadelphia Naval Hospital, headquarters for all the navy's eye and ear casualties, the doctors have undertaken a policy that prides itself on keeping the men from developing "hospitalitis."

"Hospitalitis" is deadly, they believe, to a man who has become blind or deaf and knows he must return to a seeing or hearing world. If he is allowed to sit and think about his injuries or receive pampering attentions, his feeling of segregation is increased.

Folks' Attitude Important
Almost the minute a casualty steps inside the tall white doors of the gigantic hospital, he enters a routine of activity: classes to develop his salvaged senses, hobbies that can be useful and pleasant, and part-time work. In addition, immediate steps are taken toward planning what he will do when discharged.

Lt. Comdr. A. Duane Beam, a Michigan eye doctor before he became head of the hospital's eye division, is emphatic on this point: "It's not helping these boys to lead them around. We've had boys go home completely independent and their families insist on feeding and dressing them after we've taught them to do this for themselves. The boys try to make their families stop, but finally give up after their families have made them invalids."

Top doctor for the hearing casualties, Lt. Comdr. Francis L. Lederer, author and well-known authority, cited another case where the normal individual failed to make room for the handicapped: "One of our deaf casualties was jailed by his wife because he was talking so loudly she thought he was angry with her. He didn't realize he was talking loudly and she didn't realize why."

No Broom-Stringing
Although preparing the world for these boys is the worry of the doctors, preparing the boys for the world is their job.

Blinded casualties whose eyes last saw bloody beachhead fighting or deafened men who last heard a command to "Fire!" are first given complete medical attention—surgery, if it will help. If they are 95 per cent blind or almost totally deaf to conversational tones, they enter a training period of approximately two and one-half months at the hospital here.

The blinded men are taught to read Braille, type, dance, and play the piano or some other instrument. Lt. Comdr. Beam brought to the hospital a corps of blind teachers to relay to the boys a sensitivity to danger.

Carpentry or leather work may be undertaken by the boys, but no broom-stringing or making cane chairs is allowed.

Screened for Jobs
At the end of the course, the men are screened for their new jobs. Some may want to return to college or enter vocational schools. Surrounding industrial plants have made jobs available for both training and permanent purposes. A New Jersey manufacturing plant reported the navy blind had less absenteeism and fewer accidents than their regular employees.

When the men leave, seeing-eye dogs are free if they want them. Only 50 per cent have taken the dogs in the past. Some use canes; others, nothing.

The deafened men attend classes in lip-reading and speech correction. A deaf person always has difficulty in regulating his own voice, but his chances among other people are enhanced if he can adjust his voice to a near-normal level, Lt. Comdr. Lederer says.
