INFECTIOUS
There are various types of infections as well as various infecting organisms. Much depends upon the potency of the infecting material, the location of its inception, and the vital energy inherent within the tissues or organs involved. Nevertheless, when infections strike, the defensive forces of the body put forth their greatest efforts. The nerves—the communicating system—carry the messages of need from the tissues involved. The proper tissue cells receive the orders, and soon, out over the supply lines—the circulatory systems—go battalions of phagocytes to counter-attack the infection. Unhindered supply systems and normal function enables the body's defense forces to successfully combat the invading forces.
