In the windows of one of the larger stores here the story of Hansel and Gretel is portrayed; all done mechanically, yet the little Gretel was so lifelike as she knelt by her bedside and bowed her head, I wanted to stroke the blonde braids and tell her that her dream would surely come true. And come true it did in the window. A dark blue velvet curtain studded with little electric stars slowly rose and you should have heard the children, noses pressed against the glass, gasp with astonished delight. A mamma kangaroo sewed in a most energetic manner while her baby kept bobbing in and out of her pouch; Santa drove over a snowy hill in a silver sleigh. There were regiments of lollipops and ice cream cones and the whole was the most delightful extravaganza I've ever seen in window decorating. After a meeting last night in which the tumultuous issue was discussed, the post issued a statement denying that economic interests were involved in the action. The statement pointed out that not all Japanese names were removed from the roster and said that the post "would be proud to replace the names of those Japanese on our honor roll now serving in the armies of the United States when and if they or a relative will make an authenticated written statement that they have renounced their Japanese citizenship." The post further questioned the wisdom of permitting Japanese to return to the Pacific coast at this time and demanded to know why the governors of the three Pacific coast states were not consulted in the move to return them. The statement declared that west coast citizens should refrain from violence and pointed to the post's pledge to uphold law and order. Closing time for Sunday. Top Late to Classify 5:30 Saturday afternoon—Please remember. Olive Barber's Observations A country woman looks at store window decorations: I've found out why city prices are higher than small town prices and from now on, it's okay by me if they are. (I'm not buying anyway!) It is because city stores put such magnificent holiday displays in their windows.
