Olive Barber's Observations

• • •

If no other record of these times was left except the songs of today, a fairly accurate picture could be drawn from these. Surely only a multitude of wives and sweethearts bereft of their men could account for the popularity of "I'll Walk Alone" and only a global war could make so many so desolate. This song is also a favorite of service men and a cafe proprietor tells me the way they endlessly select this number on the juke box would get on his nerves were it not that in this very repetition there is so much of pathos.

The same heart desolation is responsible for the popularity of "Saturday Night is the lonliest Night of the Week." Always, when I talk with the wives and sweethearts of men in service, they say they can stand being alone through the week with some fortitude. But Saturday night is a nightmare of lonliness; a time only to be endured and lived through somehow.

The rivival of "Together" expresses the wishful thinking of thousands of couples.

Expressing a different need but one springing from the stress of the times is the song, "Don't Fence Me In." For never before, even during the depression, have men looked forward to owning land as they do today. In a world from which security seems to have departed, unconsciously men's minds turn to that which has always been, always will be. In so far as anything can represent security, land does. So "Give Me Land, Lots of Land" becomes the theme song of the multitudes who stumblingly search for something permanent; something to tie to. Surely the composer of that song was inspired when he conceived a phrase voicing so universal a hunger.

It was a broken record of this song in a cafe which started me on this train of thought. Getting as far as "Give me land, lots of land," it then endlessly repeated "lots of land, lots of land." Or would have repeated it endlessly had not some one turned it off. Yet that repeating record was but echoing the repeated wish of thousands. And the beautiful miraculous part about that wish is that it can come true.

RAIDER DECORATED

San Diego, Cal., Jan. 31—(U.P.)—Lt. Col. Evans F. Carlson, founder of the famous Carlson's Raiders, has been awarded his 21st decoration—the Legion of Merit—for his work in the battle of Saipan, marine officials reported today. Carlson, who was wounded during the battle, received the award at the U. S. Naval hospital.
