HARDENING of the ARTERIES

Some hardening of the arteries is usually considered a normal accompaniment of advancing age. But if this condition is premature or excessive it should be regarded as a condition of disease. Arteriosclerosis—hardening of the arteries—usually involves the arteries quite generally. But often some particular organ, as the brain, eyes, kidney, or heart is especially affected. It is for this reason that clinical manifestations are often, at least in part, attributed to localized lesions. So the arteries in areas where they can be felt may be normal, at least for the age, while those of the brain, for instance, may be quite hard. This condition is much easier prevented than cured. So keep your nervous and circulatory systems and eliminative organs functioning normally the Naturopathic way, and enjoy health longer.
