Oliver Barber's Observations

With one accord, those dealing with juvenile problems stress the importance of regular Sunday school attendance as a means of delinquency control. Trying to see why this was so, I couldn't; at least to my complete satisfaction.

Having attended Sunday school most of my life with what might be called relentless regularity, yet I was unable to put my finger on its influential element. The time spent in Sunday school is largely given over to the learning of Biblical history, memorizing scriptural passages and the singing of songs. True, there is some emphasis placed on right living, especially on the evils of drink, but I failed to see where there was enough to influence conduct of any great extent; especially when I remembered the week-long periods between lessons.

Too, much of the class time, too much in my estimation, is taken up in getting put for the real purpose of the meeting. Out of an hour spent in Sunday school, I doubt if 15 minutes is given to the actual study of the lesson and its application to real living. Yet statistics show few children who have good Sunday school records, have had social records.

In conversation with a group of mothers who regularly send their children to Sunday school, I told them of my puzzlement and asked them why the singing of a few songs, the gathering of birthday pennies, giving out story papers, plus a few sketchy passes at the lesson, should be such a pronounced influence for good. Well, those women gave what, to me, was a satisfactory answer.

Not discounting in the least the effect of the teaching of the principles of right living, how ever casual this teaching might be, yet the main benefit derives from the fact that children who attend Sunday school come from good homes. It takes parents who have their children's welfare very much on their hearts to get up early on their one day of rest and see their youngsters off to Sunday school.

So the social contacts children make in Sunday school are with those whose parents take seriously their moral responsibility as parents and as citizens. Were the lesson entirely omitted, Sunday school would still be a constructive influence.

Which reminds me—I wonder if the son and his wife are doing the right thing by Scotty, the grandson. However, it's really a little early for concern, seeing he's scarcely 18 months old. But Sunday school is a "must" for his near future.
