Oil Flows Out of Family Water Tap
West Nyack, N. Y., U.P.—When Mr. and Mrs. Arthur M. Finnessey of Sicketown Road turn on their water faucets they get fuel oil, the kind they use in their furnace.
It first happened on Dec. 27 when Finnessey drew himself a tumbler of oil at the kitchen sink. Experts have established that oil was seeping into the 300 foot artesian well. The source, however, they could not determine. Meanwhile the Finnesseys are lugging water from neighbors' homes. Finnessey is a United Press teletype operator.

Quinine Bark From Latin America Is Shipped To States

Minneapolis, Minn.—(U.P.)—Eight hundred tons of quinine bark are being received monthly in the United States from Central and South American sources, says Parker Anderson, of the University of Minnesota farm staff, who spent eight months searching for new supplies in Ecuador, Colombia, Peru and Guatemala.

Anderson recalls that quinine originated in the high altitude jungle countries of South America in the 16th century, and says this is evidence that excellent quality is possible, despite the fact that Java became the source of supply for 95 per cent of the world's quinine before the Japanese conquest of that island. The university scientist says, however, that advances in research point to the possibility of producing a synthetic quinine even better than the natural variety.
