SENILITY

Senility is the feebleness of body and mind characteristic of or occasioned by old age. Some become old in years without these characteristics particularly developing, while they may manifest strongly in others comparatively young. A reason for this aside from years, there must be. There is no doubt that the body is endowed with power to endure long beyond the present average age. The primary unit of the body is the cell. Within the cell lies the power of reproducing itself and of maintaining a normal existence. But this power exists only so long as the surrounding medium of the cell is favorable to life. It is now well established that cell-life will go on almost indefinitely if that medium is favorable. Some have thought that senility is due to the cells no longer having the power to multiply. It is now generally known that this medium of the cell is the controlling factor. The reserve capacity of the cell has been amply supplied by Nature. Then Nature's laws must be followed.
