THE BABY'S FEET

Dr. Brady sound silly?

A reader says her baby is two years and four months old and the shoe salesman told her the baby's feet are flat and needed arch supports. The salesman had some arch supports made by a shoe-maker to his specifications and told her to be sure the baby wore them constantly. Doesn't it sound silly?

If the reader had taken the baby to a clothing shop to get a coat, and the saleswoman had found that the baby had spinal curvature, would the gullible mother have permitted the saleswoman to have a spinal brace made to her specifications, for the baby to wear constantly?

Having invested in the professional services of the shoe clerk and the arch props made to his specifications the prodigal mother took time out to think a bit. She decided to consult—no, indeed, not this mother. What, consult a physician, with all that cash burning a hole in her pocketbook? She consulted two physicians. The idea began to check on No. 1 with No. 2's diagnosis, opinion or advice. It is the method of a lot of Wiseacres use.

The first doctor, she continues examined the baby's feet, told her there was nothing wrong with them, advised her to discard the arch supports and, when she bought shoes for the baby, to select soft flexible oxfords instead of high shoes or footwear of any kind that is rigid or stiff under the feet or serves as a bandage or support around the ankles (as do the tight uppers of high shoes or boots).

The doctor suggested some simple exercises to strengthen the baby's feet. The baby thinks the exercises great fun. That would be enough for you and me—but who are we to raise an eyebrow or shake a head at the extravagances of the upper classes?—but there is still the second doctor to entertain us. The second doctor said the baby's feet were all right, but he gave the customer her money's worth by disagreeing with the first doctor about the type of shoes. He sort of took the wind out of the lady do's sales by asserting that all children should
