LIES THAT WILL NOT DIE

My good friend John Bartlett, always at my side, though tattered and torn, tells me that Sophocles got off this one: "A lie never lives to be old." Well, that one has survived more than 2000 years.

Almost daily in the mail, some one asks how much salt peter to give to curb, control or suppress sexual desire, or how it is administered in the army, the navy or various institutions. There is no ground for the notion that salt peter (niter, potassium nitrate, nitrate of potash) has any such effect. It is not used and never has been used in the army, the navy, prisons or other institutions, as an anaphrodisiac. What keeps this lie alive?

A lie that still breathes feebly but has steadily waned in the last twenty years, is that of "marking" the unborn baby. This lie would die out in a short while, I believe, if school children were given a fair deal in education. No one who has an elementary knowledge of embryology—of the child's development before birth—can take any stock in the old wives' tales of "marking". To worry about the possibility of "marking" the unborn baby is to betray ignorance.

Belief in or fear of "marking" is a surtax or penalty imposed upon prospective motherhood by our nineteenth century educational standard. This groundless fear not only impairs the expectant mother's health and happiness as any morbid worry does, but in a great many instances interferes seriously with those everyday activities which keep a woman fit for easy labor and early involuement or return to normal. In my opinion—remember, I'm just a one-horse-and-a-buggy doctor—belief in and fear of "marking" the baby accounts for a great many cases of difficult and complicated childbirth and many more cases of sub-involuement or delayed return of pelvic organs to normal and consequent prolonged disability.

Another name for "marking" is "prenatal impression." A woman is just as susceptible to shock from injury, fright or a repugnant spectacle when she is with child as at any other time. But she ought to know that however great her own suffering or injury may be, short of loss of life, her baby is virtually immune and invulnerable.
