SKIN PEELING FOR FRECKLES, LIVER SPOTS AND ACNE PITS

A method of treatment sometimes used with success in the treatment of freckles, chloasma (moth patches, liver spots and other localized areas of excess pigmentation) and the pits left by acne pustules is the application of a chemical irritant in just the strength necessary to produce mild dermatitis or inflammation of the skin, which is followed by more or less desquamation or "peeling" which removes the spots.

Dr. Brady mild dermatitis or inflammation of the skin, which is followed by more or less desquamation or "peeling" which removes the spots.

Sometimes this treatment proves highly satisfactory. Sometimes it proves unsatisfactory.

In any case it is a fifty-fifty venture. That is, if the patient is willing to undergo the treatment without further assurance than that the doctor will give the treatment. No physician can honestly guarantee satisfactory results. If you learn of one who seems to make a positive promise or guarantee you had better give the charlatan a wide berth.

Formerly I might have taken a chance suggesting here the name and strength of a chemical irritant to use for this purpose, but not now. Seems as though I was never so fond of sleeping nights as I am now. And among our cionchik million readers there are always a couple hundred who contrive to interpret the simplest recipe in a way calculated to give me a bad case of insomnia.

In the booklet "Cosmetic Blemishes," (for copy send ten cents and stamped self addressed envelope, but no clipping.) I do describe a chemical solution which carefully applied to the pigmented spots only and not to the surrounding normal skin, two or three times a day, will remove freckle, "liver spot" or chloasma. There is no assurance that the spots will not come back.

Freckles, at least, are funny that way. Of the thousands of children with freckles when they grow up, I had eleven thousand seven hundred and twelve freckles on my face when I was a kid.
