New Type Magnet Is Aid To Crime Detection Method

Chicago (U.P.)—A new-type magnet for lifting revolvers and other weapons from rivers and lakes has been developed by Charles M. Wilson, director of the Chicago police crime detection laboratory.

The magnet will lift 175 pounds. Heretofore, police have used cumbersome electro-magnets with a lift of only 40 pounds.

Principal element in the device is an alloy known as alnico which is easily magnetized. Once charged, the magnet will retain its power for six months and can remagnetized.

One of the magnets, 28 inches long, has lifted a 90-pound electric saw with motor and stand. It can lift nearly twice that weight, Wills on said, and will easily pick up revolvers, rifles, shotguns or knives from a river bed.

And the GIs get their answers from files bulging with the correct government information.
