PROSPECTIVE FATHER STAND BY Well, here we are again, fighting to keep the family a going concern here where the business has dropped to an all-time low. First there is booze and the night club and cocktail evil; then it is imperative to keep up with the Joneses; and if these factors fail to wreck the business there is always the birth "control" idea — which I'll discuss in an early issue if the propagandists let me live long enough.

I became despondent the other day when a correspondent, expressing interest in my article criticizing doctors and hospitals for excluding expectant fathers from the delivery room, told of his resentment at being excluded from the operating room when his wife was being operated on for appendicitis—he was paying the bill and he believed that gave him the right to see for himself whether her appendix was actually removed. . . . but I didn't hang myself, I just threw things around a bit, stormed out of the playroom and went over to the bowling green. There in two hours and 21 minutes of amnesia I had my ears pinned back—and by a guest bowler at that—and came home in chastened spirit, to carry on the fight to make a man out of the prospective father.

In the preceding talk on this subject I quoted the objections a physician practicing gynecology and obstetrics made against the presence of the husband or other relative of the patient in the delivery room, namely, that most such rooms are too small and the husband would be in the way of doctors and nurses; that the husband is likely to become overanxious and demand surgical intervention, and that the physician has to divert time and attention from the patient to keep the husband in hand. Note that this specialist makes no allusion to contamination of the environment — and that is the first objection raised by the people who run certain hospitals, especially by the "men in white" and the nurses who are so fond of dramatizing their performance, you know, wearing gowns, wisps of cheesecloth over their maps and all that show business. I might be more impressed by such hokum if I had not seen so many serious breaches of aseptic discipline or technique by "men in white" and by nurses doing bit parts in the show. The head nurse or superintendent of an obstetric or maternity department in a middle west hospital contrived to be quoted in the local paper as not agreeing with my recommendation that the husband remain with his wife during delivery. She said husbands are too likely to faint at a critical moment and
