DISTRESS
One important form of distress arises from an accumulation of gas. This gas is usually in, or stays in, one place in the colon. This distress arises as a result of gas distention. This distention produces pain by pressure upon delicate nerve endings. The contents of the colon are normally moved along easily from segment to segment. This movement is easily and without pain or discomfort. It is also normally co-ordinated into propulsive waves. When a lack of co-ordination between the segments exists, tension results, gas or gas pockets form, and discomfort is produced. Poison, either produced within the system or taken into the system, may be a cause of this lack of co-ordinated propulsive waves. Nicotine because of its injury to the delicate nervous mechanism of the intestines is considered a leading cause. Another cause is the lack of balance between the spinal sympathetic and the parasympathetic nerves. Correct this inco-ordination and your health will necessarily improve.
