WHITE OAK USED TO FASHION HATS IN LATEST STYLES

Alexandria, La.—The old gag about making women's hats out of just anything is mighty nearly true—particularly in Louisiana where one imaginative designer fashions smart chapeaux from white oak strips.

Sixty-year-old John Leavines uses a hatchet, a knife and one-inch strips of the wood, and turns out hats. He got the idea when he was weaving white oak baskets.

Leavines has lived all his life between the tiny hamlets of Sieper and Otis, in the hills about 25 miles southwest of Alexandria. The white oak he uses in his new industry grows all over the south.

His first effort was too small, had little shape and was of too coarse material—but it set him on the road to the nifty headgear he now produces.

Hat making is a lengthy process, he explains. First you find a white oak with as long a "cut" (distance between the roots and the tree's first branches) as possible. Then you split the trunk into bolts with a hatchet. The hard handwork begins when you split strips from the bolts with a pocket knife.

You can split white oak till it's thin as paper," he declared, and produced a translucent piece of wood to prove it.

When he gets the strips as thin as he wants them, he works up a sheen with sandpaper. Then, with all the material ready, he can begin weaving the hat.

His hats—and he makes them for men as well as women—are comfortable, cool, durable, water resistant and good-looking.

He's even added a synthetic resin finish which makes them waterproof. He can put his hat in a rainbarrel overnight, shake it out the next morning and wear it to town.

Lieut. Chamberlain On Terminal Leave

Lt. C. E. Chamberlain arrived in Medford this week on terminal leave from the army. Lt. Chamberlain served 11 months as ship transportation officer during the three years and two months he was in the service. He has made two complete trips around the world and was in Iraq, India, Persia, all major Pacific islands and other countries throughout the world. For the past three months he has been at Camp Stoneman, Calif.

He is the son of Mr. and Mrs. R. E. Chamberlain, Eagle Point.
