HYPERTENSION

Hypertension is a word often used to signify high blood pressure. It originates in many different causes. One of the first questions upon the discovery of hypertension is "Shall we try to reduce it?" The answer is usually "yes!" But many factors must be taken into consideration. Local infection should be sought and if found eliminated. The relation of diastolic or low to systolic or high pressure is an important factor. Pathology if present, of the vascular system, the liver, the digestive tract, and the kidneys must be considered in the treatment of hypertension. Often the condition of the kidneys depends upon the continuance and intensity of the vascular lesions attendant upon hypertension. If heart failure or brain hemmorrage do not develop, the symptoms of renal insufficiency usually do. As hypertension usually originates in "multiple causes," multiple therapeutic measures are usually required. The bio-chemical treatment of naturopathy is the natural method of attack.

RATIONING RETENTION CAUSE WILL BE SOUGHT

Washington, Oct. 12 — (U.P.) — A senate small business sub-committee set out today to find if "political pressure" is preventing an immediate end to rationing of fats, oils, butter and meat.

Chairman Tom Stewart, D., Tenn., said he had information that "excessive" shipments to Europe were going to deprive Americans of their "rightful share of the world's food supply."

Regular barge service is maintained over the Intracoastal Canal system of Louisiana and Texas as far west as Corpus Christi. The system extends westward from the Mississippi River at New Orleans.
