Freezing Experiments Used On War Captives By Nazis

Nuernberg, Nov. 7.—(U.P.)—Hermann Goering was named today as the mastermind behind a medical experiment in which Nazi doctors froze human guinea pigs and then tried to revive them by such media as scalding water and "nestling" with nude women.

The experiments, allied investigators revealed, were ordered by Goering, as head of the Luftwaffe, in an attempt to discover better techniques for treating German fliers downed in the frigid waters of northern Europe.

Old Theory False
Ironically, the human freezing tests uncovered the falsity of the widely-accepted cold application treatment for such cases. The experiments, which resulted in death for countless victims drafted from Nazi concentration camps, proved that rapid immersion in hot water is by far the best method of saving those suffering from exposure.
