Effects of Malnutrition
The effects of malnutrition have perhaps never been so forcefully demonstrated as in a report from France as to conditions there. Among the first to be affected, as a result of the deprivation of essential nutrient elements, were the children. And their condition is becoming progressively worse. It is now common in France to see cases of rickets, skin infections and pellagra. Military tuberculosis and caseous pneumonia are rapidly becoming more frequent. The average height of children has already dropped below that of pre-war days. The workmen are better fed but even their nutrition is inadequate. Progressive weakness among the workmen is becoming more manifest. They are also showing increasing sensitiveness to cold and to mental depression. The body cannot maintain its vitality and function normally without adequate nutrition.

There came a period when it so buffeted me that courage seemed a quality which I could no longer lay hold upon. And during the several years when I walked constantly with tragedy, the hills came to mean a refuge to which I would go again and again. Those hills rolling so endlessly about me dwarfed things below, dwarfed the troubles which had driven me there. Far below, I could see people walking, riding, mere pygmies in the distance; too ineffectual to bring either sorrow or joy to any one. The tumult in my harried young mind would quiet and again I found myself repeating as though it were a litany, "I will look unto the hills from whence cometh my help."

"I have 'looked unto the hills' all my life and they have never failed me. I have gone to them a broken thing, unable I thought, to face one more day of living; and have retraced my way revitalized and with a renewed faith that life could be a fair and lovely thing if I could but retain the courage of the hills' benediction."

I have gone to them in a contrary mood, when it seemed my soaring spirits must surely mount the stars. The hills were there just the same. They tempered my too great exuberance into something substantial; solidified the moment's exaltation into lasting strength; gave to the passing moment a reality I could draw upon later when the current turned and bore me in the opposite direction.

The old gentleman has long since passed on but the hills remain. Other generations will follow, will suffer and need succor and comfort. I pray they too will have as I had, some grand old man of God who will give them the key to the comfort they need in the words, "I will look unto the hills from whence cometh my help."

Twelve million bushels of potato chips were produced during the last 12 months. An additional 5,000,000 bushels will be processed within the next year, according to the National Potato Chip Institute, Inc.
