COASTAL TUNA FISHING UP TO PRE-WAR SPEED

San Diego, Cal. (U.P.) — War was so peaceful for the tuna. For four years he enjoyed unbothered rest, disturbed only by the distant thunder of guns and the occasional death rattle of a sinking ship.

Now, peace has returned and the war against the tuna is on again in full blast.

In San Diego, where 65 per cent of the nation's tuna catch is packed, it's swinging into full-fledged blitzkrieg.

With $35,000,000 worth of business and employment for between 4,000 and 6,000 workers involved, the San Diego canneries and tuna fleets are hot on the trail of an annual catch exceeding 125,000,000 pounds of fish and 1,000,000 pounds of lobster.

Small fortunes are pouring into cans and catching boats as local canneries become increasingly confident of the future of the industry.

New Ships Off Ways
New tuna boats are sliding down Pacific Coast ways and being outfitted with Diesel engines and refrigerating systems in a small-scale version of America's wartime shipbuilding program.

The new ships will join a fleet of 50 150-footers already experienced in the chase, plus about 40 "war veterans" wearing fresh discharge paint. Used by the Army and Navy as inter-island supply ships and "errand boys" delivering perishable goods, these boats cruised the war zones for four years and are now being returned to their owners.

Fathometers and other long-range navigational aids are being installed to increase the range of these boats past the 12,000-mile mark.

Boat Costs $450,000
With a capacity of 500 tons, the big new all-steel Sun Dial is typical of latest designs in tuna boats.

Costing $450,000 to build, the Sun Dial is 131 feet long, can carry the biggest tuna load in the fleet's history. It sailed from Tacoma, Wash., to San Diego recently, bucking coastal storms all the way.

Two new firms are planning canneries in San Diego, costing around $2,000,000, while the five existing facilities are planning expansion.

And the tuna captains—who own their boats and pay for them with what they catch and sell to the canneries—are talking about radar and use of airplanes as spotters to increase the catch.

The war is beginning for the tuna.
