location of the administration's wage-price policy.

Volume held around yesterday's total for the first four hours and the last hour showed a reduction in turnover as compared with the corresponding period of the previous session. There was nothing else in the news of market importance except the wage-price policy. Wall Street held that if this did not provide a base for settlement of the steel and General Motors strikes, the market might run into real difficulties. Hence the cautious selling as the traders waited for the report, which was reported delayed in preparation late in the day.
