Women Who Diet Get Blame Of Price Drop

Milwaukee, U.P.—The slim-waisted women of today have betrayed the farmers, says Prof. James J. Lacey, University of Wisconsin animal husbandry department. It's their fault that hog prices dropped.

Lacey said at a "pork pushing" meeting that if women ate as much pork as men do, there would be no problem about raising hog prices.

"But women who want a slim waist shun food that contains lard," he said. "There's probably not much we can do about it unless fashion suddenly swings to a plump look."

Chemicals And Rope To Play Large Part In Spring Fashions

San Francisco—In this atomic age, it's old-fashioned to think that fashions are made of just plain fabrics. This season, according to top-notch resort designers, cellulose and rope!

The combination of the three is what makes "spuns" or linen-looking weaves. Rayon, or chemicals forced through cellulose, and linen, made of flax or hemp, when combined, produce what they call "butcher linen"—which, the designers say, will be the leading resort and spring "fabric" of the season!

The entire resort collection of famed California "pair-off" designer, Stephanie Koret, is "butcher linen"—porous and lightweight, traveling easily from luxury liner to family wash-tub. The "kangaroo pocket," which holds two hands comfortably, is spotted through this group of shorts, pedal-pushers, skirts, and town-trotter suits. Each pocket has a vertical bound buttonhole, and is trimmed with self-fabric buttons. Pockets are also placed differently now: very high and just scanning the shoulder line on jackets, and very low on skirts.

Jackets are all shorter and fitted, some bloused and belted. Skirts are tight from the waistline down. All the blouses are slope-shouldered or practically sleeveless, a sure sign of this spring's fashions. Pastel checked cotton is used as a coordinating fabric... and it's made of (strangely enough) cotton!

Designer Stephanie Koret says, "When fashion designers are given enough rope, there's no telling what may result!"

Despite a critical paper shortage in Japan, 200,000,000 textbooks for the coming school year are scheduled for production of which over 179,000,000 are already printed.
