Fuchs May Have Given Russ Head Start On H-Bomb

London, Mar. 2.—(U.P.)—Russia may have gained a head start over the United States on hydrogen bomb research through information furnished by Dr. Klaus Fuchs, atomic scientists said today.

They pointed out that Fuchs was known to have been working on hydrogen bomb theory at the time he was meeting with Russian agents. He was then the third leading atomic scientist in Britain and head of the theoretical research department at the Harwell atomic center.

Results Said Given
During his last major contact with Russian spies early last year he was believed to have advised Soviet agents that the United States and Britain were convinced a hydrogen bomb could be made.

At that time, scientists said, Fuchs undoubtedly gave the Russians the results of his own preliminary work on the hydrogen bomb and its vast destructive possibilities.

President Truman did not announce the American decision to go ahead with production of a hydrogen bomb until early this year, although preliminary work had been going on for some time.

With some of the secrecy removed from the case as a result of Fuchs' trial yesterday, informed quarters disclosed that Fuchs was trapped through a single word in a Russian agent's notebook found in Canada last year.

Name Found in Book
The notebook contained Fuchs' name followed by the Russian word "nash"—means "ours."

This set off a full-scale investigation which disclosed that the German-born British scientist had been revealing atomic secrets to Russia since 1942.

Fuchs was sentenced to 14 years in prison yesterday. With one third time off for good behavior his sentence will be reduced to nine years and four months.
