Jet-Propelled Cars Termed Impractical By U.S. Engineers

Detroit, Mar. 9.—U.S.—Jet-propelled automobiles would make too out of pedestrians and burn other cars right off the high ways.

That was the reaction of U. S. auto engineers today to British press reports that one English firm has won the world race to produce the first jet-powered car.

"What race?" asked one engineer, "research expert. 'If there is one, they ought to tell us about it.'"

Aren't Practical
"Jet-propelled cars just aren't practical under existing road conditions," said another engineer. "Can you imagine what would happen if you were behind one that started up with a roar?"

With a grim smile, he answered his own question: "Why, you'd be seared to a crisp."

According to the British reports, the Rover Car company, maker of a popular medium priced car, has developed the jet automobile in collaboration with the ministry of supply.

London papers said the Rover jet car is powered by a gas turbine engine known as the "Whizzer," which uses kerosene as fuel and develops 300-horsepower on the American scale.

Although Detroit engineers scoffed at jet-propelled cars as being no more practical than propeller-driven ground vehicles, they were extremely interested in any turbine engine development.

The gas turbines deliver power by means of a rotating shaft coupled to the driving wheels of a motor vehicle.

Experts Disagree
Automotive experts, in some cases, disagree about the merits of gas turbine engines for widespread car use.

George T. Christopher, who retired last year as president of Packard Motor Car company, wrote in a recent magazine article that gas turbines definitely were on the way.

"While the car of 1950 may not be powered by atomic energy, it is quite likely to have under its hood a small, simple and extremely economical gas turbine," Christopher predicted.

"In any event, it will be as far ahead of the car you are now driving as this year's models are ahead of the cars of 1934."
