Man in California 4,000 Years Ago? Scientists Query

Berkeley, Cal. — (U.P.) — Two University of California anthropologists believe man existed in coastal California "more than 4,000 years ago."

They attested that a skull found 27 years ago in an old stream is that old.

The anthropologists based their conclusion on the geologic age of the gravel bed where the skull was embedded and the changes that the specimen had undergone.

The skull was found in 1922 buried under 20 feet of soil and gravel near Stanford university at Palo Alto, Cal.

Geologists who examined the site ruled out any possibility that the skull had washed down from higher levels. They maintained that the specimen not only was full of gravel, but cemented securely in the same mixture.

Other remains of early man have been discovered, anthropologists Robert F. Heizer and Theodore D. McCown reported, but circumstances surrounding the discoveries made positive age identification doubtful. Until this latest report, there was little evidence that man has existed more than five centuries in California.

Heizer and McCown believe the skull was of a male aboriginal Indian about 38 years old. The skull is now in the Stanford university geological museum.
