Meat Inspection Laws in Oregon Said Among Worst
Klamath Falls, Ore., May 10.—Oregon meat inspection laws were labeled as "one of the eight worst in the country," by F. L. Ritter after the marketing committee told the Oregon Cattlemen's association yesterday the state needed tighter meat inspection laws but not compulsory federal grading of meat.
Ritter, adviser to the Oregon Meat Council, told the delegates independent packers would ask the state legislature to set up a complete state inspection service financed jointly by industry and state funds.
Recommendation Made
After industry leaders and state officials criticized the inadequacy of present Oregon meat inspection laws, the marketing committee made its recommendation for tighter meat inspection laws.
Ritter said eight plants were following voluntary inspection rules created by the state at the instigation of the federal meat grading service.
State Director of Agriculture E. L. Peterson and Ritter said satisfactory inspection would hinder small slaughter plants. Ritter said some small plants should not even be licensed because of unsanitary conditions.
Opposition Shown
Opposition to compulsory meat grading as proposed in the Portland area came in the forms of resolutions from Umatilla, Grant and Harney county associations.
Producers were concerned that Portland's possible adoption of compulsory meat grading would force the hand of other Oregon towns, "just like daylight saving time."

Walnut Blight Spray Advised This Week
The first spray for the control of walnut blight should be applied to walnut trees in the earlier locations the end of this week, County Agent C. B. Cordy advised today. He said the spray should be applied as soon as the young walnuts can be observed in the ends of the new growth.
Two sprays spaced 10 days apart will generally give the needed protection in this area and Cordy suggests the use of one pound of yellow oxide to 100 gallons of water or specially compounded dust of fixed copper, lime, sulphur and oil will give control.
Cordy also reported that the first cover spray for codling moth control has been delayed by the cold weather. In an average season, he said, the cover would have been used about May 15, but this year it will be delayed until at least May 25.
The exact date for the completion of the spray cannot be set until warm evenings give the codling moth a chance to fly and lay eggs.
