Actress Refuses To Cut Tresses For Picture Role

Hollywood—(U.P.)—A boyish bob may be a new high in stylishness, but a lady who knows her men says it's a new low in sex appeal.

"A woman's long hair is her great allurements," complained Corinne Calvet, tossing her light brown mane. "Cut my hair? Never!"

Miss Calvet, French charmer who has had considerable experience with sultry and seductive roles here and in France, staged a one-woman revolt when Hal Wallis suggested she trim her tresses for "My Friend Irma Goes West" at Paramount.

Miss Calvet devotes much of her time before the camera setting her cap—and her coiffure—for Dean Martin.

"It would be impossible," she said, "to catch a man without long hair."

Those flowing, luxuriant tresses are the very first thing a man notices about a woman, Miss Calvet claims.

First Look Counts

"A man is walking down the boulevard behind a girl," she said. "The first thing he sees is her hair. Yes, even before her figure. And with men the first impression is very important."

Of course, the man may get a let-down when the girl turns around, Miss Calvet conceded.

"But even a plain girl with a luxuriant head of hair can be quite appealing," she said. "I cannot understand why women are willing to sacrifice one of their most precious possessions for fashion."

"Women should not be slaves to every fad that comes along. They should consider what men prefer. If, as they say, women dress for men, they should also wear their hair to please them."

"Nest-ce pas?"

Mais oui, Miss Calvet, mais oui. She still has her long hair.
