Princess Margaret Keeps Slim But Dieting Not Used
London—U.P.—Princess Margaret, who would be described as lovely if she weren't a princess, keeps her figure despite a hearty appetite.

While the heavy starch diet of post-war Britain is driving many women into dieting and grilles, the 19-year-old princess still tips the scales at not much over 100 pounds, yet plows through nightly menus that would satisfy a longshoreman.

Princess Elizabeth is also a good eater and looks it, although she photographs heavier than she appears to the eye. Nevertheless, she is almost a dilettante compared to her younger sister, Orders With Zest.

A night or two ago chance placed the princess a table away from a United Press correspondent. The princess looked ethereal in an informal dinner frock, slightly décolleté, with a pink Juliet cap diamond clipped to her hair.

She looked ethereal but there was nothing spiritual about her order. She eyed the menu zestfully, discussed the dishes with the headwaiter and settled for lobster thermidor, skewered lamb with bacon, tomato and onions, a side dish of rice and chicken and for dessert, zabaglione, which is eggs whipped with marsala wine.

She washed down this snack with champagne.

Security forbids pinpointing the night or the name of the restaurant—the restaurant's security, that is.

The princess resolutely refuses to return to eating places which capitalize on her presence, even though it is hardly a restaurateur's fault that reporters also eat.

As the princess left this particular restaurant, somewhere in London, there were murmurs from the other diners. There was admiration from the men for her costume; envy from the women for her ability to disregard calories.
