

Arthritis Sufferers Claim Uranium Mines Give Help

Boulder, Mont. (U.P.)—The question has been raised here of whether there can be something in a uranium mine that will help sufferers from arthritis.

Physicians and scientists are interested. A uranium mine in this small southwestern Montana community began operations last year. Since then several ailing persons who have visited the mine claim to have noticed a marked improvement in their condition.

However, some medical authorities believe it may be what they call a "psychosomatic condition." In other words, the arthritis sufferers, some of whom may not actually have arthritis, may be getting a form of mental relief.

Operator Concerned
Doctors also pointed out that there are several forms of arthritis, and something which helps one form may be of no value for those suffering from another form of the disease.

Wade Lewis, president of the Elk Horn Mining Co., which operates the mine, is concerned about the matter. "It would be tragic," he said, "for any belief to get out that there was a so-called 'miracle cure' for arthritis in the mine." It is quite possible, he said, that the mine has nothing to do with the arthritis victims' improvement. In that case, persons suffering from arthritis who visited the mine in hopes of being cured "might easily be in for a crushing let-down," he said.

Radon Gas In Mine
One thing that might have something to do with it is the presence of radon gas in the lower levels of the mine. Radon is a heavier-than-air gas given off by radium. Several years ago the gas in the old shaft was strong enough to put a geiger counter over its high scale and out of action for an hour or so.

Air was forced into the shaft and the radon gas blown out. Before that was done, it was impossible to do any work in the lower levels because the strong radioactivity was dangerous to miners.

Possible presence of radon gas has at least one physicist, who asked that his name not be used, alarmed.

He fears that if there is enough radioactivity in the mine to help arthritis sufferers, it is possible

Korea Pilot Sends Note to Landlord Who Evicted Wife

At a Jet Fighter Base, Korea (U.P.)—Sabrejet Pilot Capt. Conrad E. Mattson Wednesday asked his wife in Springfield, Mass., to tell the landlord who gave her an eviction notice.

"Thanks for nothing, and the next MIG I get will be for him," Mattson learned of his wife's predicament Wednesday after shooting down his second MIG. He downed his first Tuesday.

Mrs. Mattson, mother of three children ranging from nine months to four years of age, was informed Tuesday that she must vacate her house by April 8.

Told by United Press
Mattson received first word of the affair from the United Press and asked that the following message be sent to his wife:

"Have just been informed of your being evicted and must vacate by April 8. I am much worried. Please check legal rights in this particular case. If nothing can be done contact Westover Air Base to effect the move. Inform the dentist who is evicting us, 'thanks for nothing, and the next MIG I get will be for him.' Love, Conrad."

that harmful results could occur in later years.

Claims It Helped
Talk of a possible arthritis cure in the mine started when the wife of a California mining engineer visited it with her husband. The woman, who said she was suffering from arthritis, said she noticed improvement in her condition within a few days after her visit down the shaft.

Later she told a friend who also suffered from the disease. The friend also noticed improvement after visiting the mine.

Lewis then decided to have the matter investigated and told physicians and at least one clinic about the reports.

One scientist summed it up this way: "There hasn't been enough work done to establish any scientific knowledge about the whole thing. It's much too early to make any scientific comment about it one way or another."
