Steel Industry May Become Independent

New York—(U.P.)—The American steel industry is keeping its fingers crossed. A new method for recovering manganese from slag may make the nation's steel producers independent of foreign suppliers, according to Steelways, the magazine of the American Iron and Steel Institute.

Before 1949 Russia, for example, supplied the steel industry with a third of its requirements for manganese, the most important alloy in making steel. In 1949 the source was cut off and since then steel industry officials with representatives of the U. S. Bureau of Mines, have been experimenting at Pittsburgh with a blast furnace designed to process slag for manganese.

Says Steelways: "When this plant closed at the end of 1951 to expand its operations its blast furnace was producing three and one half tons of 20 per cent manganese metal a day from nine tons of open hearth slag."

Experiments are continuing with the construction of a converter with four times the capacity of the original one.

A portable cocktail cabinet carried over the shoulder like a handbag.

A giant piano weighing more than one ton.

Automobile fenders made of rubber.

Firemen's helmets capable of resisting an electric shock of up to 10,000 volts.

An electric wire fence to keep goats from straying.

is 54½ inches high with 32-inch thick concrete walls. The overhead roof is three feet of reinforced concrete.

Kish equipped the room not only with a main entrance from the basement but also an emergency escape hatch, like a submarine's.

This cold war reality costs about $1,200 and weighs more than 75 tons, when fitted with fire extinguishers, food, water supplies, power, bunks and emergency oxygen supplies.
